Dee Flint spewed from her filthy fuck hole:

<cunt snipped>

Just what we needed.....more crap from amateur radio's famous, fat, filthy, tramp.

Maybe if there weren't so many faggots in ham radio Dee might get some dick. Then she wouldn't have to settle for the tired old nigger truck driver. No self respecting white man wants to fuck that nasty tub of lard, but lucky for her a nigger will fuck anything. Most hams are looking to recruit "young men" into ham radio and "administer" tests to them.
They're always eager to "elmer"
them.....hahahahahahahaha!!!!!!!!

one I have no reason to believe that BB or Len know this speculation is flase I don't even know it is false. I think it may well be true, or close to the truth

the simple fact is I doubt believe much of anything you write. You lie provably and what I can't prove is a lie much of it does not make sense leading a reasonable person to suspect you are lying

BTW no spamming is occouring, i am flooding the NG a bit but no spam at all

then we have another provable Stevie lie

If I have credibilty to lose then you lied in the past when you claimed
I had no credibility

all I am doing is treating you to dose of your own medicine and you claimed when you were doing that you not stalking the target or harrasing the target, indeed you claim the target had to expect such treatment for posting on the internet at all

Dee, it's too me that the fundamental principles of the Republican and Democratic parties don't vary much, extreme in the fringe edges.

On the other hand, when you have candidate of either parties who are total incompetent, such as Mitt Romney and Kerry Healey who not only are incompetent and also don't have a hint of a clue, it is critical to limit or inhibit their aspirations by whatever means is needed. The same can be said about John Kerry, in the last election. Kerry is a total and demonstrated dumb ass, who is only in politics to advance his rather egotistical ambitions. I would rather vote for his wife than him, in future senatorial contests.

By contrast, I rather like what Ted Kennedy does in the senate, even though I am a conservative Republican.

Perhaps I'm strange, but I would rather vote on a candidate based upon their past performance and voting record in the job, than then their party affiliation. What they professs to believe doesn't really do much for me.

Party loyalty also doesn't do much for me.

Better yet, opt out of the sheeple-orientated party system and vote for the CANDIDATE who best matches your politics. Urge your friends and family to do the same. Only then will we get candidates who listen to PEOPLE, not to moneyed interests.

quoting stevie blunder

Now, you can ether apologize to the ENTIRE NG with a sincere and effective apology and stop this assinine behaviour, or there ARE legal avenues open to stop you.

Stop now or else.
unquote

you are making yet another threat

based on the legal advice I receive I warnyou again that if your threat involve arriving at my home you should be aware that I will view the arrival of person that has made threats against in the past as prima faci proof that that the threating/ariving party intends me harm, this therefore based on the advice i have receive would justify the use of deadly force on that party.

In any event deadly force will be offered you stevie if you choose to disregard my warnings to stay away, what ever the result I will risking trying to explain/defend my actions first to the DA then if needed a jury rather than take the risk that you have come to harm me or my family.

I give you this warning in an effort to see that I don't have feel the need to try and kill you. I realy don't want I don't want to remember such a monet the rest of my life. I also give you this warning here in public, so their will be clear evidence that I have tried to deterfrom carring out this possible and unforunate action

the subject refered to as stevie or stevie and the person that is the suject of this warning is named and identified below

It's neither.

And curious how you claim that I was "defiling" Dick, W0EX for simply mentioning his old callsign was about to expire, yet here you are defiling a man you never spoke to, even in THIS forum, do exactly that thing.

How Morganesqe.

You may not intend them to sound as such, but your idiotic,

Markie, the only "threat" here is to USE the force of LAW. If you stop now, there's no need to feel "threatened". If you don't aplogize

if you show up you will meet the criteria

No, you are not.

The First Ammendment to the Constitution of the United States has NOTHING to do with the protection of religious practice.

Nor does that ammendment address individual citizens...It prevents the GOVERNMENT from abridging the free speech of the people...

Ergo...You are NOT "up on it" when it comes to the Constitution of the United States OR its attendant ammendments AKA "The Bill of Rights"

I am lying about the count of your messsages?

Are you now retracting that statement? Because it's the only way you could then claim I am lying...otherwise it's all premised on what

Markie, just last week you tried to "slip in" a "message": from

No, I made NO THREAT to you, Markie.

If it ever gets to having defend that in court, you KNOW I am going to pull YOUR comment out that it was made in refrence to...

YOU, on the otherhand, specifically stated you intend to inflict deadly force in contravention to Michigan law.

Unlike you, Markie, my words mean what they mean...No more, no less. No "hidden definitions" that I might try to pull out of a hat to cover my butt when for some perceived written faux pas such as YOU have tried to do.

"Infested" was YOUR word. However YOUR use of it now leads me to believe that you DO have or recently HAVE had some "problem" that required medical intervention to resolve.

Oh, NO, Brain!

Don't understimate yourself, Brain!

You're your OWN jerk, and I am sure you have PLENTY of stomach for it!

And unlike you I can see you being able to "stand" yourself. What I CAN'T see is you subjecting your family to a jerk like you.

quoting stevie
YOU are the "stupid" one, Markie.

I'm going to call it later in the morning.

If it's been re-asssigned since I had it changed and the new owner reports even ONE harrassing phone call (even if it's NOT from Michigan...), guess whose name and address I am going to give them, along with links to this forum, e-mail addresses, etc etc etc...?!?!?

unquote

bluster away

why must you threaten people

esp with empty threats

I am currently venting a bit someone else has pissed me off as well and I can just let join my feeling for stevie

indeed i will not be able to sustain all that long but we can count on stevie helping me out, by whining, bitching and moaning meaning that throught this barrage I stay on my own message which is showing the lurkers that Stevie is not a trustwrothy source

I also get to do the same to dave as he spouts off in defense of stevie

the only thing that realy shocks me is that the annymouse even stavies annies mouse not mount any sort of realy campaign of defending stevie just throwing up some more stuff they are dumb enough to think emabrsihes me.

I am not emabarished about my sexuality I just think this isn't the place for dicussing sexuality, but clearly stevie does (while claiming it is all my fault he has called Todd gay) not a pretty sight I agree, but stevie makes it plain. I have the choice between seeing it strewn with Stevie lies about me, todd, frank bb, len, the law comon decentcy or I can try to cover all of that with

I have chosen the later

I apolgize to any intereference with the few threads that either ontopic of at least near topic, which of course Stevie never does he just wades in with his flamethrower and does even admit he doing it

No, I'm not.

Seeing one documented liar pat another on the back for spending his welfare money sitting around the computer and spamming USENET is not very impressive.

Rather pitiful, I'd say.

Nope.

You said "bb"

No one presently pariticpating in these exchages signs his/her posts as "bb".

Even if they did, without actually signing a post that says "bb is
######## " there's nothing to go by.

Since YOU state that anyone can use whatever "difnitions" they want to at any time, I chose to decide that "bb" is Bridget Bardot.

YOU are the one going on-and-on about "Hiram Maxwell".

You've not said who "Hiram Maxwell" is.

Mark,

>>Indeed ecil does admt to that so do I. What we ask is why certain skils
are being places out of proportion to their value? and Why Morse in particaluar retains its place today.<<

It is in place to keep YOUO off the HF bands, Mark, didn't you know that?

In 1916, HPM was given a Tarot Card reading by an all-knowing oracle and she forsaw that you would one day create hate and discontent for your fellow licensee's by your actions in this NG and on the air. Furthermore, he was shown that you would be responsible for the disruption of major disaster
communications because of your ineptness and arrogance.

Therefore, he initiated a cospiratorial effort to ensure the perpetuation
of Morse Code so that you and others of your ilk would be thwarted from becoming a threat to the airwaves.

>>It is simply another of lies to claim we don't admit to that.
Indeed
Iam shocked by you admiting to that, since most ProCoder on and on about how easy Code is for everybody<<

I know people with incapacities worse than the dyslexia you claim that have mastered Morse Code, so what is YOUR problem? And I know that of those for whom neurological deficits sufficient to cause them to really be able to copy code used a Neurologist, NOT and Allergist to document thier ailments!

So you are either lazy, a liar, a fool, or a combination of the three.
Please don't tell us, Mark...it's SUCH a challenge to find out for ourselves!!!

How is YOUR lack of attention to detail somehow attended to some "lack of respect for the disabled"...?!?!

> I know it IS beyond you

No, it's not.

However I will have copies of your posts wherein you try to get various 'waivers' for the Morse Code test from an ALLERGIST...

Your only "disability" is being lazy and stupid.

Like I said, Markie...you go right ahead...And if I may suggest, start adjusting your domestic budget right now to accomodate those legal fees. Most lawyers start around $50 to $75 and HOUR for their services after the initial consultation, and it goesnowhere but up from there.

1 December 2005

Dave,

What is W1AW's current policy with regard to its bulletins, and can you refer me to the ARRL Board minute which established this policy? Specifically, does W1AW listen and/or QRZ each published scheduled frequency before transmitting? If the frequency is busy, does W1AW QSY, delay, or even terminate the scheduled bulletin?

The policy published in QST that I have found is to stick to the published schedule regardless of whether the frequency is busy or not, just as is the policy of K1MAN for information bulletins, which is also consistent with many years of W1AW operating practice as well.

Yow will remember that K1MAN was "fined" in 1990 with regard to this policy, and my appeal of these "fines" to the full Commission was "deep sixed" and thus blocking my further appeals to the D.C. Court of Appeals and the United Stated Supreme Court. Also, these "fines" were never litigated in Federal District Court here in Maine, and my subsequent civil suit to resolve this matter in Federal District Court against the FCC was dismissed. My related civil suit in Federal District Court against ARRL was also dismissed. My many attempts to resolve this matter have thus been repeatedly thwarted. K1MAN was then "fined" again regarding this same policy in April of 2005, a full fifteen years after the original FCC action, thus creating a further legal nightmare for the Commission, of course.

I am a member of ARRL. Thank you for your attention to this request.

Best personal regards. 73.

Save your emails. If you need this information, get it like every other Respondent/Defendant -- thru discovery.

USN apparently still tries to be "more sophisticated" than other branches of the U.S. military? They don't have Military Deny what?

That anything said about the Feeble Five has been proven over and over? Of course not. It's true.

That any 6 year old with basic reading and math skills can go back

Mark followed Josh to the back of the room and slipped around the corner and out of sight while Josh dropped to his knees and unbuckled the man's pants and pulled out his penis. It already smelled of fresh cum, and Josh hungrily put it into his warm mouth, eager to receive another load of cum from the big dicked stranger! Mark hadn't said much up until then, but as he was being sucked he said, "That's right little boy, suck my big pecker, make it shoot its goo into your slutty little mouth!" Hearing that kind of lewd talk made Josh work even harder on the thick member, and in a few more minutes he was rewarded with a torrent of hot cum down his eager throat! Mark pulled him to his feet and kissed him hard on the mouth and told him to pull out his own cock. Mark took his own cum covered dick and Josh's into his hand and began jerking them together, both heads slipping and sliding together, their velvety smoothness
combined with the saliva and cum on Mark's cock, bringing both men to the verge of ejaculation!
Josh just stood there, his erection rubbing back and forth against Mark's, his orgasm now fast approaching. Josh couldn't hold back any longer, and stammered, "Oh my, god, I'm gonna blow!!!"
Both peckers convulsed at the same instant, sending spurts of cum into Mark's rapidly moving fist, their cum inter mingling together as their cock heads rubbed side by side.

Your header says, "Will dave..." No, Dave won't. The text says, "when will Dave....". The answer to that is: never. You write of moral decency, Mark, but you don't exhibit any. You attempt to use my religion (one rejected by yourself) to justify your actions and choices in life.

I doubt that CBs are sending morse code. I heard some CW signals that sould like beginners too so perhaps there is some new blood in the hobby.

Anyway I would rather be listening to the radio that read some of the crap that is posted in these newsgroups. I don't the condition of ham radio but I must say the condition of news groups associated with ham radio have declined a lot since I last read them.

I must say that someones advice to find a local club is the way to go. At least people there are interested in HR and not just there to kick other people or make dirty jokes.

Since you are on the outside of amateur radio and you disagree on morse code testing, I can understand how you came to that conclusion. Radio amateurs who favor retention of the morse test can and do laugh at many other things. You write only from your experience.

I recall that during the last few days of the Gore campaign, Clinton's people come out with even more absurd surplus numbers in an attempt to get more votes for Gore. But the People of Tennessee wouldn't vote for him so why should the rest of us?

Anyway, it is obvious that troop strength isn't what it should be.

Heh.. nobody out there willing to "Elmer"...

However, there does seem to be a plethora of people looking to inflate their egos, or better yet, sit and tell others how clueless they are; and call it teaching.
Then there's a few that I'd swear could literally dumb another person to death with their random babble.
It's funny [and not limited to ham radio] that only the 'can't teach' types always seem be the teachers.
Plus, I've never met a ham that wasn't involved in/obsessed with, a power-struggle of some sort.
Who needs it?

No one wants to show you how to do something, they just want to talk about how you can't.
[see below]

The truly intelligent only pass through amateur radio, finding out they were better off without it.
So, yes ma'am, nothing left but appliance ops and CB-types that won't listen to anyone and think they know it all.
It's a pathetic cycle, eh?

Oh, and ham isn't going anywhere... it's akin to a bug on a windshield....
wipe on it and all you get is a bigger mess that still won't go away.

You violate any number of His teachings, Mark. For starters, you reject Him totally. I'm afraid I can't accept being lectured on Christianity by a bisexual, polytheistic pagan.

I can see that it is your view. You have a pretty twisted view of quite a number of things.

You're a moral person, Mark? Please explain just how that can be. Does a moral person lie at will? Does a moral person indulge in sadistic or masochistic bisexual behavior which can involve human waste? What kind of twisted behavior is that? What sick kind of "faith" are you following?

I don't lie at will, but maybe you can't see the difference. But I am

It is under my view moral to lie in some circumstances. Indeed that Which assumption is that?

Is there anything wrong with being serious or intense?

Let's see....WK3C and K2UNK spent their own time and money to visit FCC officials about the Morse Code test issue. That's pretty SERIOUS and INTENSE, isn't it?

(not that there's anything wrong with that...)

> BTW, there's 3,796 filings now, one was added on the 28th. :-)

Was any law broken by such late filings?

Your buddy Mark claims that late filings break some law or other.
Straighten him out - if you can.

How? Is there a deadline for FCC?

So? Does FCC have to get NPRMs in the Federal Register within a certain amount of time? Perhaps you should tell them off and put them right, Len - after all, you've said you're not afraid of authority. You could put in some of your diminutive nicknames and catchphrases, and criticize them for taking six long weeks.....

> The date period for comments

Which is why some of us didn't file comments right away. We waited for the official announcement. Others had no patience and just had to let fly before the official date.

So? It took them a little longer. Have you no patience?

And the majority of those were anticodetest. The procodetest folks, in general, waited for the official comment period.

What does that say about the two groups' understanding of the regulations?

Nonsense. Most of those who filed comments are licensed amateurs, aren't they?

Not this time! Why don't you complain, Len? Tell 'em
how it should be done!

You filed before the deadline, didn't you? ;-)
Did you file any of your 10 filings too early? Maybe the folks at FCC are chuckling over the fact that you couldn't follow the rules...

1 comment - 8 reply comments - 1 exhibit - 146 pages if my count is right......

While you have every right in the world to comment to FCC, Len, did it ever occur to you that maybe - just maybe - your long wordy diatribes
really don't help the nocodetest cause one bit?

What "rule of law" prohibits late comments?

Wrong on all counts there, Len. Completely wrong.

How? By trying to raise the level of technical knowledge required for a full-provileges license?

> Mark, Jimmy has NOT proven his "fact."

You have not disproved it, Len.

> The only way to determine

How do you know I haven't done that, Len?

For most of my life I've lived in the Philadelphia metropolitan area.
Washington DC is a day trip from here - done it many times. In fact, some things I have designed are in daily use in the DC metro area. It would be a simple thing for me to take a day or two to see all those 6000 "filings".

> Those old dockets and proceedings aren't on-line.

So? They were reported in the publications of that time (1960s).
Is something only true to you if it's online, Len? What evidence do you have that the 6000+ comments claim is not true?

Perhaps you don't want to accept it because it disproves your opinions.

> As to "disaster," that is subjective opinion.

Yep. FCC thought it was a good idea at the time. FCC still thinks it's a good idea, but with fewer levels.

> In the long run,
> "incentive licensing" only served to harden the class

Subjective opinion.

> It got too cumbersome for the > future to the Commission, so they streamlined it via FCC 99-412.

Yet the basic concept of a series of license classes, each with increasing test requirements and privileges, was reaffirmed by FCC. As for being "too cumbersome", FCC refused all proposals of free (no test) upgrades, which would have greatly simplified the license class structure and the rules. Instead, we now have the six license classes anyway, with Novice and Advanced no longer issued new (but renewable and modifiable indefinitely), and Technician Plus being renewed as Technician even though the privileges are different.

In fact, a case could be made that there are at least 9 different license
categories (for those who hold current licenses) if you count differences in operating privileges and test element credit:

1) Novice
2) Technician without code test
3) Tech Plus or Technician renewed from Tech Plus, pre-March 21, 1987
4) Tech Plus or Technician renewed from Tech Plus, post-March 21, 1987
5) Technician with code test CSCE less than 365 days old

6) Technician with code test CSCE more than 365 days old
7) General
8) Advanced
9) Extra

There's even more if the test credits for certain expired licenses are considered)

Doesn't seem to faze the FCC.

> The League lobbied for, and got "incentive licensing."

But not just the League. There were no less than 10 other proposals in favor of the concept. They differed in details but not in the basic idea. There was widespread support for the idea both inside and outside the League. Also widespread opposition. The support won.

It's odd that all the other proposals, and the features they suggested,
are so often forgotten, and the League gets all the blame.

Maxim was a genius. You're not, Len.

And then why did ARRL oppose the creation of the Extra class license in 1951? And why did ARRL's 1963 proposal not include any additional code testing for full privileges?

And why did ARRL oppose FCC's 16 wpm code test proposal and "Amateur First Grade" license class in 1965?

How? By increasing the written tests? That's what ARRL proposed.

Class A, Class B, Class C.

Not better. Just more qualified. You're Not Qualified (to operate an amateur radio station).

Incorrect. Since 1990, there were medical waivers for the 13 and 20 wpm code tests. The criteria for a waiver were so vague and general that anyone who really wanted one could get one. You could have easily gotten one, Len. But you didn't.

> >IMO it has been one of the banes of the ARS for decades

> True enough.

Not at all. After the incentive licnesing rules went into effect in the 1967-1969 period, the number of US hams began to grow much faster than it had during the 1960s. The growth of the 1970s continued into the 1980s.

If incentive licensing was so awful, why was there so much growth in the ARS in the two decades after it was put in place?

No, I don't. You try to pass off that false statement on various people, but it's simply not true. Of course logic isn't your strong suit, Len.

Pointing out that you are not a radio amateur is not the same thing as saying you are not allowed to "discuss" or comment. (What you do is not really discussion - it's mostly long boring wordy lectures repeating the same tired old mantras and insults as if they are sacred.)

How do you know others haven't done similar things and kept

Do you think those 18 proposals to FCC after July 2003 just wrote themselves?

Not by itself. Needs a whole network to do the job.

If the cell phone serves your radio needs, why are you so obsessed with changing the rules of the Amateur Radio Service?

Gee, Len, you never modified it to a solid-state inverter supply?
Those supplies were common 40+ years ago. You can get all the details in any ARRL Handbook of that era.

> Living within a mile of I-5 passing

Why aren't 40 channels enough? Actually, if SSB is used, there are effectively 80 channels.

Why isn't that enough? Could it be because cb users didn't follow the rules for that radio service?

What should my attitude towards cb be, Len? Do you think I should praise it and say it's a model of what a radio service should be?

Not true at all, Len. Of course you express contempt for all who have passed such tests....

Not true! Most of my "working receivers" are general coverage.
I also have several transceivers. You're not qualified to operate any of them, Len.

It's still a very popular mode in amateur radio. It's alive and well.

So they're a dying technique. Imagine - Morse Code is probably used far more
than those old 100 wpm teleprinters....

So they're all dead or dying technologies, while Morse Code lives on and flourishes.

ALL what?

Once upon a time, there were a great variety of commercial FCC operator licenses. Having one usually guaranteed the licensee a fairly decent job, protected by FCC regulations. That era is long gone. That's why I pursued an engineering degree rather than a First Class 'Phone or 'Telegraph license.

> An amateur radio license was NEVER a "qualification" to

I don't recall anyone ever saying that an amateur radio license was anything other than a qualification to operate an amateur radio station. Can you show us where someone claimed otherwise, Len?

Funny - you always talk about your jobs and such, but not resources.

Not me, Len. You must be looking in the mirror again.

Mark, you are responsible for everything you post to usenet, or place on a web site. In this case, the very foolish person who posted the perverse sex advert is you. Steve is not responsible for your choosing to do so. If you didn't want it brought up, you should never have posted it.

No, Mark, I am not lying. I know the identity of only one anonymous poster, Roger Wiseman, our local sociopath. I tried to warn you of him once before. You called me a liar. You've likely learned a bit in the interval.

>> Do you have allies?

Are you suggesting that making it tougher to get full privileges was the cause that accelerated the growth of the ARS? That has to qualify as the most outrageous notion to hit RRAP (outside the dump huck posts from Mark) in the current century.

Clearly other "market forces" were in play for the ARS to enjoy the popularity it did in the post-Sputnik years. Science was "cool" and the hot ticket for education and career planning. Scientifiic-seeming hobbies like electronics, radio, and astronomy were beneficiaries of this attitude. If anything, dis-incentive licensing was a damper (not an accelerant) on the growth of the ARS during that period.

That's about as close to saying something by saying nothing as I've seen in a while. You've told us that you lie when it is convenient for you to do so. Doesn't that mean whenever you feel like lying? You babbled something about telling the truth or lying are marks of moral or immoral people. What are you trying to say?

C'mon, Mark.

I think you're barely de-vined. It appears that you have some peculiar notion that only by having sex with men and women are you fulfilling your religious duty. Sorry, Mark, we're through. That's a crock.

You can paint a ceramic monkey gold and pray to it, Mark. It isn't going to make you appear less sick.

I don't mind you and stevie seem to mind

What I object to is stevie posting then bitching about the results of his choice to bring the stuff HERE

What I object is Stvei and yourself (as I recallyou have donethis) saying Todd is homosexual. I object to you and Steve when you falsely state I am homosexual instaed of telling the truth that I am bisexual

I would be happy to show all fo you Dave stevie, anybody, that is given the quality (or lack of it) from the ProCode side I don't think his coments helped the No Code side at all, but only because the rsult was something the Procoders had the clear burden to make the case or esle the FCC would go with the NoCode Position

indeed I don't think any of the NoCode coments will play much role in the final outcome. I hope my coment my affect some issues on the margin of the NPRM but it is a slim hope

Dave and Steve object to the fact I don'thide my sexuality welle nough

Stevei insists on lying about the sexual orientation of severl folks

Stevie refuses comepletely to answer what sexuality has to do with radio and objects to me responding to these attacks which started

I am trying to oush bac we shall see how it plays out

Indeed Steve claim he has called to cops to have me arrested for flooding the NG

I assmue he is lying about that one but stevie can stop by simply saying why what I or or Todd or BB or

I do? I don't care if you bray it from the roof top. It's a little late for you to think about hiding it now, Mark.

You don't really have a choice at this point.

You can't possibly hide it now, Mark. That cat's out of the bag.

Get it straight, will ya. You can't hide your perverse preferences.
They're already out in the open.

...but not irrelevant to the poster, no matter what the topic. Your sexuality is a known. It is a given. If it weren't known by the revelation of your kinky advert, it would have been know by your writing of men talking to you on the phone, thinking they were talking to a woman and wanting to marry you, or your thinking that Steve wanted to have sex with you. Those goofy posts would have been a giveaway.

You mean the other unstable types. Yeah, they do. A couple of them are downright lunatics, Mark. You cuddled up to one in the newsgroup. He turned out to be Roger Wiseman. His posts are extremely distasteful.

> what is moraly wrong is that you INSIT I am responible for mentioning > my sexuality but Stevie is not

Not "INSIT" You can "insit" at the "outhouse" but I think you mean "insist". I insist because *you made a personal decision" to post your advert in a very public place, just like that bulletin board at the Kroger store. If I'd seen it at the Kroger store and wrote it down and shared the information with my friends at a local bar or a local restaurant, we'd have the same outcome. Now if your sexuality was closely guarded and someone got into your private papers and revealed your secret, you'd have a different ballgame. In this case, you have no reasonable expectation of privacy.

> cuting you moral venom

The word is "cutting", Mark, "cutting" and you aren't cutting. The words are still there.

That matters not. You posted it in a public forum.

> I am not responible for stevie going out and reposting such materail

If you'd not put it where it could be seen, nobody would have been able to repost it. Then again, you claim that you aren't hiding it and aren't ashamed of the ad, so why are you complaining?

Hmmmmmmmmmmmmmmmm.....

YOUR posts have "gummed up" the group for several days now. Over 200 in all now. So the "civil" issue is yours. You are not causing ME any pain, discomfort or loss of service. However there ARE others here who may not feel that way.

YOUR screen names are the nes they see.

YOU are the one who thinks it's OK to teach children to lie, so again the "moral" issue is yours.

And "truthfull"...?!?!?

Mark C. Morgan has NO BUSINESS suggesting the truthfulness or deceitfulness of any OTHER person is above or below board, Colonel!

Your "question" has been answered for three days now, yet you continue to cause this disruption for hundreds of others in your "quest".

That's got "selfish" AND "stupid" written all over it.

> everyone should be advised that The following person > has been advocating the abuse of elders

You continue you this deceit, yet everyone here KNOWS who's been investigated for "elder abuse", the admission of which came from YOUR own "mouth", Markie.

It isn't me.

And still "broadcasting" some other persons phone number. And you suggest I am "unstable".

Gay, oh soo gay. They were gay. Oh sooo gay.

I once knew a group of gay guys.
They were homos to the core.
They would hit on guys all week long and,
On the weekends they were man-whores.

Now their story is one of homosexuality,
and grabbing other men's butts.
Their story is filled with gay steamy love,
And touching eachothers nuts.

Todd and Mark,and Ben,
They were homos since they were ten,
They loved making hot manly love,
They never liked wear their rubber glove,
That is why their shafts are brown,

Todd and Mark,and Ben.
They were homos since they were ten,

Repeat 2-4X - Gay oh so gay. They were gay. Ohh soo gay!

Hello,

The following message is automatically sent to every new poster or cross-poster (as of June 19, 2002) to any of the rec.radio.amateur.*
newsgroups. It should be sent once, and only once, to each unique address. This is a welcome message. The Internet amateur radio community welcomes you to the newsgroups, including rec.radio.amateur.*, and welcomes your input, opinions, and constructive participation. To help make you feel welcome, experienced participants like myself have chosen to systematically inform you, as a new poster, about useful information resources and user tips to enable you to get the most out of these newsgroups. I hope you will consider the message in that spirit.

* * *

1. The news.announce.newusers newsgroup, moderated by Jon Bell, et al, contains a number of very informative articles providing an overview of net-etiquette, suggested writing styles for electronic forums, and other various do's and don'ts concerning Internet culture. If the articles have expired at your site, you may also access them from:

ftp://rtfm.mit.edu/pub/usenet/news.answers/news/

2. Original newsgroup voting and charter information for the rec.radio.amateur.* hierarchy, as well as for rec.radio.info and rec.radio.swap, may be accessed from:

ftp://ftp.uu.net/usenet/news.announce.newgroups/rec/rec.radio.info ftp://ftp.uu.net/usenet/news.announce.newgroups/rec/rec.radio.amateur-reorg ftp://ftp.uu.net/usenet/news.announce.newgroups/rec/rec.radio.amateur.dx ftp://ftp.uu.net/usenet/news.announce.newgroups/rec/rec.radio.amateur.boatanchors

3. The Guide to the rec.radio Newsgroups, originally written by Jay Maynard, K5ZC, is now maintained by Jeffrey Herman, KH6O. It provides an excellent overview of all of the Usenet newsgroups devoted to amateur
and CB radio. It may be accessed from:

ftp://rtfm.mit.edu/pub/usenet/news.answers/radio/personal-intro

4. The rec.radio.swap FAQ: A Guide to Buying and Selling on Usenet, also originally written by Jay Maynard, K5ZC, is now also maintained by Jeffrey Herman, KH6O. It contains a number of good pointers for reading

and posting articles concerning the buying and selling of radio and radio-related equipment on the Usenet newsgroup rec.radio.swap (which, with the sole exception of rec.radio.amateur.boatanchors for vintage equipment, is the only appropriate newsgroup in the rec.radio.* hierarchy for such articles). It may be accessed from:

ftp://rtfm.mit.edu/pub/usenet/news.answers/radio/swap-guide

Please direct any submissions feedback, or administrivia regarding the above two resources to jeffreyh@hawaii.edu.

5. The national amateur radio society of the United States, the American Radio Relay League, has a presence on the Internet. You may access their comprehensive and informative home page at:

http://www.arrl.org/

(They also have information about amateur radio organizations in other countries.)

6. Read the newsgroup first to see if your question has already been answered. You may also view, and search for keywords in, older news articles (going all the way back to 1981) at the Google (formerly DejaNews) archive:

http://groups.google.com/

Many topics have been discussed before, often in great depth, but the articles have expired at your local news server. Services like Google allow Usenet a much longer "institutional memory," greatly benefiting both new and experienced users.

7. If you do post to the newsgroup, give as many details as possible. After you post, read the newsgroup for a week or two to see all replies to your posting. A recommended practice is to ask for responses by E-mail and offer to post a summary if others are interested in the answer to your question. Note that it is (almost without exception) inappropriate to post your article to all (or even a significant subset of) rec.radio.amateur.* newsgroups. Please pick only the most relevant newsgroups (2 or 3 at most), and post your article as a simultaneous cross-post (check your newsreader documentation) so that only one article is propagated, and the article is only shown once in a newsreader.

8. Remember, Usenet newsgroups are based on the idea of mutual aid. Usenet only works if we put as much into it as we get out of it.

How can you...?!?!

You have clearly demonstrated in recent posts that you don't have a clue as to what FCC rules and regulations are, and you're incapable of understanding mode and bandwidth designators!

You asked for "info" about the 60 meter band recently, and when provided specific details on your request, called the provider a liar and said his information was "useless".

You're clearly incapable of understanding what those rules and regulations are!

That behaviour is only directed at those who help to foster it.

For example those who call others names when they weren't called similar names to start with.

BTW Brain, you've yet to answer why YOU continue to do so, espeically in regards to Jim Miccolis.

Is it?

Gee, Brain, I thought a few days ago I said I'd cool things if you did.

I did, but what you did was keep right on digging in.

Oh no! There are quite a few other people here with whom I correspond, at times even "toe-to-toe", yet life seems to move on.

However those persons whoim I call the "Feeble Five" seem to be the exception.

And, uh, Brain...That includes you.

Don't presume to caution me again, Brain.

And no, I don't need to "talk" to your wife or child.

They can surf the net and see how you act behind their backs without any assistance from me, I am sure.

The thrill is gone since there's nothing for you to do, Brain.

Now...If you want that civility thing to work, IT TAKES TWO.

How things proceed from here are up to YOU. Be careful how YOU respond!

333. HOWTO: Clean up rrap

Newsgroup: rec.radio.amateur.policy
Date: 2005-12-02 13:55:44 UTC
From: Lloyd <lloyd@no.spam>
Message-ID: <88087017833.2458F8789@tarrnews.net>
Source record: 126103

The easiest and most effective way to clean up this (and any other news group) is to filter the posts. Note that some of the poorer news readers don't have effective filtering abilities, so if you have one of those news readers, you'll need to download a free replacement. For Windows users, one such free replacement is Xnews. It is available at the URL

http://www.download.com/Xnews/3000-2164_4-10144167.html

The most important thing for a filtering news reader to allow you do is to set up filtering rules based on ANY arbitrary header; not just the "From" and "Subject" headers. Once you have the ability to do that, you can remove all posts whose Message-ID or whose References header contains the string "googlegroups.com". That will remove all posts made through Google as well as all followups to such posts.

You will have cleaned up 90% of the glurge.

Next, you can add a set of rules which will kill all posts coming from a specific news server, no matter what the poster may put in the From field of his posts. That's a little more complicated, but worth it, and it is done by specifying a filtering rule which examines the Path header of all posts. More of the glurge can be eliminated by using the filtering rule to kill all posts which originate at usenetzone.com. That takes care of nearly all the rest of the glurge, because it eliminates all posts produced by kb9rq under all of his sock puppets.

It is equally easy to add more Path filtering rules to kill other obnoxious news sources, such as the anonymous remailers that some posters hide behind. In that case, some of the remailers have helpfully put the strings "nym.alias.net" or "sewer-output" in the Path header, and those posts can be eliminated with the additional filters

Path:.*nym\.alias\.net
Path:.*sewer-output

Messages which are crossposted to many news groups are also very likely to be garbage, and to cut out cross posts, you can filter on the Xref header. For example, the following filter eliminates all posts which have been crossposted to more than three news groups:

Xref:.:.:.:.:

To eliminate all crossposted messages, you can use the filter

Xref:.:.:

to do the job.

Example: Before entering rrap, my news reader showed a count of 90 posts. After selecting the news group and filtering it with the rules given above, only five posts remained.

Guess rrap is actually dead.

Portable toilets are modern, portable, self-contained outhouses, usually molded of plastic. Most portable toilets are large enough for a single occupant. Portable toilets are solidified by the weight of the disinfectant liquid in the tank at the bottom of the portable toilet. Most portable toilets have a seated toilet as well as a urinal. Portable toilets also usually have open holed ventilation, lockable doors and holding tank ventilation. Like regular bathrooms, many portable toilets have toilet paper and soap
and water.

Portable toilets are used by construction sites, concert and sport venues, and large outdoor gatherings, to name a few. Portable toilets are drained, cleaned and disinfected on a weekly basis. There are city, state, and federal codes that require a certain amount of toilets to be available for large events, portable toilets are perfect for these situations. Unlike regular bathrooms, portable toilets do not clog or overflow. Some companies are developing upscale portable toilets with carpeted floors, mirrors, lights, etc. Portable toilets are usually rented from a company and hauled around from site to site in the bed of a pick up truck.

What is Ham Radio?

Ham Radio is a technical pursuit for those who are interested in the science of radio wave
propagation and who are also interested in the way that their radios function. It has a long-standing tradition of providing a source of engineers who
are born naturals.

Ham Radio awakens in its aficionados a whole-life
fascination with all things technical and gives
an all-abiding curiosity to improve one's scientific knowledge. It's a great swimming pool, please dive in!

This excitement causes a wish to share the experience
with ones fellow man, and shows itself in the gentlemanly traditions of Ham Radio.

Radio Hams are in a unique privileged position in that they can construct and operate their own equipment! No-one else has this privilege. Users, such as broadcasters,
the po lice and armed farces, CBers and mobile phone users have to purchase ready-made gear. Manufacturers are not licensed to operate their gear. Radio Hams
are qualified to design, build and then operate their own pieces of equipment. They do this
with gusto, and also repair and modify their own equipment. This is a privilege well worth the effort to gain, and one to be jealously guarded.

The excitement that drives a Radio Ham starts with relatively simple technologies at first, perhaps making his own Wimshurst machine and primary cells. Small pieces
of test equipment follow, possibly multimeters and signal generators. Then comes receivers and transmitters. It is with the latter that communication with like-minded technically motivated people takes off. The scope for technical development grows with the years
and now encompasses DSP and DDS. There is also a great deal of excitement in the areas of computer programming to
be learnt and applied.

The technical excitement motivates Radio Hams to compete with each other to determine who has designed and manufactured
the best-quality station. This competitiveness is found in DXing, competitions and fox-hunts.

-----OOOOO----

However, beware! A Ham Radio licence is such a desirable thing to have that there are large numbers of people who wish to be thought of
as Radio Hams when, in fact, they are nothing of the kind! Usually such people are a variation of the CB Radio hobbyist; they buy their radios off the shelf and send them back to be repaired; they are not interested in technical discussion
and sneer at those who are; they have no idea how their radios work inside and have no wish to find out;
they are free with rather silly personal insults;
they have not satisfied any technical qualification
and their licences prevent the use of
self-designed-and-built equipment.

These CB types engage in the competitive activities
with their Cheque-Book-purchased off-the-shelf radios
in a forlorn effort to prove that they are Radio Hams.

No _REAL_ Radio Hams are deceived by such people!

-----ooooo-----

One infallible way to disambiguate the CB Radio Hobbyist
from the _REAL_ Radio Ham is to solicit their view of the difference between CB Radio and Ham Radio. A Radio Ham will perceive Ham Radio to be a technical pursuit and will perceive CB Radio to be a social communications facility
no different in essence to a land-line telephone or a GSM mobile in the hands of a 6-year-old. Thus a Radio Ham could also hold a CB licence safe in the knowledge that such a licence says no more about him than having a land-line telephone, whilst continuing to regard Ham Radio as a separate technical pursuit.

A CB Radio hobbyist, on the other hand, sees no difference between a Ham Radio licence and a CB Radio licence. To him, they are sisters-under-the-skin. Wrongly, the CB Radio Hobbyist then tries to classify himself as the equal of the Radio Ham when, in fact, he is nothing of the kind. A sure sign of a CB Radio hobbyist is if he holds, or has ever held, a licence issued under the gangrenous degeneration that is the M3/CB Fools' Licence scheme.

-----ooooo-----

One group of people who claim to be of the standard of Radio Hams but who are in reality nothing more than an apology for the failure of a CBer are those class B licensees who falsely proclaimed that they were against the use of a Morse Test to control access to the HF bands, until, that is, a test was introduced at their intellectual level, the intellectual level of 6-year-olds.

6 year-olds simply lack the mathematical tool kit to enable them to handle even the simplest algebraic manipulation for Ohm's Law and thus, the disgraceful Class Ber's in the aforementioned category are not Radio Hams by any stretch of the imagination!

Remember - A sure sign of a CB Radio hobbyist is if he holds,
or has ever held, a licence issued under the gangrenous degeneration that is the M3/CB Fools' Licence scheme!

Ever since you were 'outed' as a CBer, you've been engaged in this damage limitation exercise which, to be quite honest, smacks of effort. Nobody really gives a toss whether you own a CB-set or not...its your 'holier than thou' attitude which people find 'old'.

However, at least I can criticise you without fear of having my door smashed down by the police and being arrested for intimidating you. You can also be sure that, should you criticise me, which you are equally entitled to do, I will take it on the chin like a decent chap and not get all stroppy about it at the local lodge.

DETERMINED would be a better descriptor.

Some morsemen get positively anal-retentive about morsemanship.

BTW, Carl Stevenson wasn't "WK3C" when he and Bill appeared before the FCC. Accuracy, accuracy! :-)

>(not that there's anything wrong with that...)

St. Hiram went to Washington after WW1.

That established a precedent on "goodness" or "badness" of
"spending their own time and money" didn't it?

Why do you ask? Guilty conscience about something? :-)

[as of 2 Dec 05 there are 3,800 filings on WT Docket 05-235]

[accuracy, accuracy!]

>> >> Why does that matter?

Oh, wow, I can't believe you would ask such a question?!?

Let's see...FCC 99-412 (Memorandum Report and Order) established the last Restructuring effective in mid-2000, the R&O itself released at the end of December 1999. WT Docket 98-143 was ordered closed in a mid-2001 Memorandum Report and Order that denied a bunch of proposals and semi-petitions that had been filed in the past year and a half to that R&O.

But...a hundred-plus filings were still made after mid-2001, the last one in 2004 (by a PhD ham, no less). He was STILL TRYING TO TALK ABOUT WT Docket 98-143! THREE YEARS AFTER THE FACT of closure on 98-143. :-)

That is nothing more than dumb, stupid stubbornness, especially by someone who has obtained a Doctorate degree. Were any of those VERY LATE filers PAYING ATTENTION?!? I don't think so.

>Your buddy Mark claims that late filings break some law or other.

INCORRECT. Mark cited NO "law or other." YOU brought out the charges of "illegality."

>Straighten him out - if you can.

Straighten out YOURSELF.

>> In the case of publishing NPRM 05-143, the Commission was 6

>How? Is there a deadline for FCC?

Why are you asking? To misdirect MORE than usual into "charges" that you invent as you go along? Or are you just trying to fight in words because of some frustration of yours?

The Commission has typically published Notices in the Federal Register WITHIN A WEEK of such Notices being made to the public.

Notice of Proposed Rulemaking FCC 05-143 was released on 15 July 2005. In that initial release, the heading carried the information that Comments [period] would exist for 60 days, Replies to Comments [period] would exist for 75 days AFTER PUBLISHING IN THE FEDERAL REGISTER.

Publishing did not happen until 31 August 2005. THEN the firm date period of filings was made.

>So? Does FCC have to get NPRMs in the Federal Register

If it wants to be of service to the PUBLIC, it should.

Already filed. See ECFS on WT Docket 05-235 for 25 November 2005, filing type EXHIBIT.

I have considerable patience. I also have fun with some dumbsnits who only want to ARGUE for the sake of arguing.
:-)

>> In those SIX WEEKS DELAY the public >> filed 52% of all comments filed.
>
>And the majority of those were anticodetest. The procodetest folks, Bullsnit. :-)

What of all the "procodetest" folks who DID comment in the "unofficial" period?

What of all those FOR the NPRM who filed during the "official" period?

>What does that say about the two groups' understanding of the >regulations?

What "regulation" states that an NPRM must be immediately published in the Federal Register?

No, the general public EXPECTS federal agencies to perform their duties in manner established by considerable precedent.
The Commission has done fairly fast work in the past on all regulation change documents publishing in the Federal Register. A SIX WEEK DELAY in publishing is an error in serving the public, a disservice.

>> The "public" may not be fully aware of the official comment >> period beginning date.
>
>Nonsense. Most of those who filed comments are licensed >amateurs, aren't they?

WHAT "regulation" or "law" states that ONLY licensed radio amateurs may communicate with the federal government on amateur radio regulations?

Name it. NOW. Not "six weeks from now."

>Not this time! Why don't you complain, Len?

Already done, as I said. Are you suddenly blind? NOT aware and informed?

>You filed before the deadline, didn't you? ;-)

Yes. What "law" did I break?

>While you have every right in the world to comment to FCC, Len, did
>it ever occur to you that maybe - just maybe - your long wordy >diatribes really don't help the nocodetest cause one bit?

None at all.

Filings made to a federal agency are not "newsgroup style."

I don't consider ANY of my filings as a "diatribe."

The comments of those FOR the NPRM might be considered
"polemical" but then so would those against the NPRM. The telegraphy test is a highly polarized, contentious issue.

Poor baby, the rest of the world just doesn't share YOUR SUBJECTIVE VIEW of everything.

Come to think of it, YOUR single filing is long, wordy, and filled with the conditioned-thinking phrases of the league.

I thank YOU for helping the "nocodetest cause" a lot!

How do you "know" that? :-)

Do you live within a day's travel to Champaign-Urbana, IL, and have you read the University of Illinois' statewide high school testing efforts of 1950? All of my two-week-long test scores (including a Stanford-Binet IQ test) are there in their archives.

Hello? 1965 is FORTY YEARS AGO!

2005 is NOW. [really...]

Some dispute about that. My suits are all lightweight wool and I don't have any suits with logic circuits in them, but I've read about some of those.

Come to think of it, I read Chris Imlay's "Comment" in WT repeating the same tired old mantras...as well as trying to take the Commission to task for having the gall to NOT ACCEPT the league's Petition entire (one of the 18 Petitions

I am not AUTHORIZED to transmit RF energy IN amateur-only bands

Title 47 C.F.R.

I have qualified to operate, test, maintain a great number of different receivers, transmitters, transceivers, electronic equipment of many kinds in the last half century. All one needs is an operating instruction manual, schematics, and an explanation of all the unmarked controls and conenctors are.

Actually, I have co-owned a PLMRS base transceiver and mobile transceivers which radio amateurs were NOT AUTHORIZED to operate! :-)

As TDDs (Telecommunications Devices for the Deaf). As I/O

Those are places I know about. There may be a few others. It isn't a hot topic to me.

"Flourishes?" You have flour in your eye. :-)

Right NOW, there are hundreds of thousands of data terminals IN USE in the world, doing throughput at rates of 1200 BPS to 56 KBPS and faster, short-range to long-range, wired and wireless. DATA. Alphanumeric characters. Most with display screens, some with peripheral hard-copy printers for text on real paper with ink or toner.

ElectroMECHANICAL teletypewriters went defunct as new products because the mechanics of them didn't allow such high throughput. The last holdouts are the "chain printers" used in Information Technologies' activities, everything from wide printouts to mass check-writing. Those are being replaced with xerographic or ink-jet printing devices.

Manual morse code "lives on" ONLY in AMATEUR radio. The maritime world has largely given up on manual morse code for long-distance HF communications.

Where are the landline manual morse code telegraphy communications stations now? Where are the manual morse code communications stations in the military of the United States?

Let's brush away some of your "flour." If morse code communications is "flourishing" in the "amateur bands," why is it only Number TWO in popularity? Once it was the ONLY way to communicated. How can morsemanship be "flourishing" when it is declining in popularity?

>Once upon a time, there were a great variety of commercial FCC >operator licenses.

Once upon a time there was NO RADIO.

Once upon a time there were NO federal regulating agencies.

Once upon a time there were no fairy stories beginning "Once upon a time..." :-)

>I don't recall anyone ever saying that an amateur radio license was >anything other than a qualification to operate an amateur radio >station.

"Qualification?" It isn't an AUTHORIZATION?

Oh, my, I've actually OPERATED amateur radio transmitters and have never had an amateur license! Operated: Set the controls, turned it on, tuned it up, reset some controls according to instructions in the manual, applied various modulation input, measured the RF output in terms of power, frequency, index of modulation, percentage distortion of modulation input, harmonic content, incidental RF radiation from the equipment other than the output connection, lots of things.

Oh, yes, and OPERATED a morse code key turning the transmitter on and off! That actually only to test the key connection wiring...the rise/fall time of the RF envelope was measured using an astable multivibrator circuit driving a mercury-wetted contact relay that was connected to the keyer input.

I have legally and successfully OPERATED communications radios from many places on land, aloft while flying in various places, from a Coast Guard vessel on water, a commercial ferry on water,
and from a private sailing craft...all doing real, live communications.

>Also in a bunch of other applications like high-end audio equipment.

Yes, by some purists who like the vacuum tube amplifier
DISTORTION effects when the amplifier input is overdriven.
No doubt that same group use "monster" cable with gold-plating to insure the "golden quality" of sound carried through such cable...

A small shop in the Netherlands might still make a $16,000 four-tube amplifier ready-built, fitted with nice little white and blue LEDs to make it sparkle when turned on. I did describe that in HERE last year close to Christmas time (it was one of the "toys" featured in the IEEE SPECTRUM).

European electronics hobbyists - a very few - are very much
"into" Nixie and Nixie-like numeric displays and some are going all-out into making digital systems using tubes. Hans Summers, G0UPL, has collected a great number of specialized tubes with the intent on duplicating a radio clock that synchronizes automatically with the Rugby standard station on 60 KHz. He already did that in solid-state as a college project. All described on his large website www.hanssummers.
com.

Now compare that to NEW products like vacuum tube transmitters, BC or space-borne comm sat transponders...like optical system detectors using photomultipliers...like night observation devices using their specialized photomultipliers...like the hundreds of thousands of microwave ovens using specialized magnetrons. Vacuum tube technology is known, studied at length, but it has "flourished" in the PAST in NEW designs.

Yes, I do. Manual transmissions are a valid comparison to Morse Code.
Someone who was really interested in a logical argument could point out that there is no separate skill test for manual transmission skill anymore.

I don't do that, Len. I am skilled in both manual transmission operation

and Morse Code operation.

You, on the other hand, have no competence in Morse Code operation, yet you blather on about it endlessly. Perhaps you should take your own advice of "Try not to venture into areas where you have no competence."

Nobody said they aren't real. They're floating museum pieces. They

Morse Code, OTOH, represents much more than 1% of amateur radio operation.

Are those facts not true? Do not powerboats dominate all but "hobby" boating?

And the companies selling Morse Code equipment.

In any event, the analogy between sailing and Morse Code is obvious,

Says who? You? Bwaaahaahaa!

Science is about discovering the laws of nature. Engineering is about doing practical things.

Benjamin Franklin was both a scientist and the first true electrical engineer. His elegant (and very dangerous) kite/key/Leyden jar experiment proved that lightning was simply an electrical discharge, and not the wrath of God, celestial fire, or some other force as was commonly thought at the time.

Franklin the scientist determined the nature of lightning.

But ol' Ben (who also founded the University where I earned my first Electrical Engineering degree) didn't stop with just the scientific discovery of the nature of lightning. He went on to develop the first systems of lightning protection (commonly known even today as "lightning rods" to protect structures. His system was the first practical electrical device or system, earning him the honor of being the first Electrical Engineer.

Yes, there is. Each filing is categorized, and a direct, automatic link provided so that anyone can compare the categorization to the actual filing documents.

I think you're jealous that someone else made the comments
so accessible.

> except in the highly-> biased opinion of a long-time morseman...

How are those results "biased", Len?

How are they any more "biased" than yours, in which you count multiple filings by the same person as separate opinions, as long as they are not exactly identical?

Do you think your anticodetest opinion is 10 times more valid than the procodetest opinion of someone who simply filed a comment?

> one whose Petitions
> before the Commission have been DENIED.

Lots of people have had their petitions DENIED, either in whole or in part:

NCI's petition to have a "sunset" clause on Morse Code testing was DENIED

NCI and NCVEC's petitions to simply dump Element 1 by Memorandum
Report and Order, and to avoid the whole NPRM cycle, were both DENIED

ARRL and NCI's petitions to give free upgrades to over 300,000 amateurs were DENIED

NCVEC's petition to create a new "Communicator" license class was DENIED.

And your request (not even a petition, really) to create an age requirement for an amateur radio license was DENIED.

Have you ever filed a real petition with FCC, Len? One that got an RM number,
drew comments, etc.? I think not.

You see facts and truth as hostile, Len. Your problem, not mine. I will not stop writing facts and truth just because they bother you.

Yes, I do. You are neither qualified nor authorized to operate an amateur radio station.

No, it's exactly right. Those whom the FCC considers qualified are issued licenses. FCC does not consider any unlicensed person to be qualified to operate an amateur radio station.

> The FCC issues licenses as part of their overall civil

FCC only issues licenses to those who demonstrate that they are qualified. The licenses can be revoked if the licensee demonstrates that they are not qualified.

All persons who have not demonstrated qualification to FCC are considered unqualified. You, Leonard H. Anderson, are neither qualified nor authorized.

You are neither qualified nor authorized to operate an amateur radio station, Len. FCC says so.

Yes, they have.

They don't have to, Len. The regulations clearly define what an amateur radio station is, and what license is required to operate
one. You don't have the required license, so by definition you are not qualified - and not authorized - to operate an amateur radio station.

You have none of those.

True, but incomplete.

By definition, you are not authorized, qualified, permitted or licensed to operate an amateur radio station.

None of which extends to amateur radio stations. You are not authorized, qualified, permitted or licensed to operate an amateur radio station.

Do you think you are qualified to operate my amateur radio station, Len?

Where have I made my opinions absolute? Give us a concrete example.

Also consider how many times you have stated your opinions as facts, then had them shown to be unsupported by facts.

When?

I have never claimed to have served in any military. That does not mean I never served.

There's a lot of things I have done which I have not mentioned here.
That really seems to bother you.

Do you think others should act like you, Len? Do you think you're a good role model of professional - or amateur - behavior?

Or are you one of those who think that others should do as you say, not as you do?

No, Hans. Correlation is not causation.

>That has to qualify as the most > outrageous notion to hit RRAP (outside the dump huck posts from Mark) in the > current century.

Why? Do you say it's impossible with no evidence?

Look at the facts:

When US hams were allowed back on the air in late 1945, there were about 60,000 US amateurs. By the time of the 1951 restructuring, the total had reached about 90,000 - even though back then the "entry-level" license was equivalent to what would later be the General.

Of course a good bit of that growth was pent-up demand from the WW2 shutdown, returning servicemen who'd learned radio in the military,
etc.

>From the 1951 restructuring to 1964, the number of US hams went from about 90,000 to about 250,000 - and then the growth stopped dead, even though incentive licensing would not take effect until several years
later (1968).
>
> Clearly other "market forces" were in play for the ARS to enjoy the popularity

Sputnik went up in 1957 IIRC.

> Science was "cool" and the hot ticket for > education and career planning. Scientifiic-seeming hobbies like electronics, > radio, and astronomy were beneficiaries of this attitude.

Sort of. When Sputnik was launched, there was widespread consternation because the US was perceived to be lagging the USSR in the "space race".

It did not help that the Soviets kept being the first to do things in space time and again for several years in the late 1950s and early 1960s. First animal in space - first human in space, first human to orbit, first woman in space,
first pictures of the far side of the Moon - the list goes on and on.
The USA
was playing catch-up for several years.

Most of all, the post WW2 growth ended before incentive licensing.
And the incentive licensing changes did not make any big changes to the Novice or Technician, and did not remove any power, modes or bands from the General
or Advanced.

> If anything,
> dis-incentive licensing was a damper (not an accelerant) on the growth of the > ARS during that period.

Really? Then why did the growth start up again after it was in place, after almost half a decade of stagnation and even some decline? Why did the number of US hams grow so fast in the 1970s and 1980s?

If you want to talk about "market forces", consider these:

- The 1960s were a very turbulent time, particularly for young people.
Many were more interested in political/social causes than in "establishment" activities like
amateur radio.

- The "space race" and the technological advances it brought made amateur
radio look a little old-fashioned in some ways. Remember Christmas Eve 1968, when the crew of Apollo 8 showed us the Earth from lunar orbit via live
TV? How could any terrestrial "DX" compete with that?

- CB radio, established in 1958, became popular in the mid-1960s as more and more people found out about it. No test at all, inexpensive, easy-to-use
equipment, very little effort or skill needed to install or use cb.

- Up until the 1960s, many newcomers were introduced to amateur radio
by hearing hams using AM voice on the HF ham bands, particularly 75 meters.

There was a natural progression from SWL to ham radio.

But by the early 1960s, the HF ham bands were more full of SSB voice than
AM. Many SWLs didn't know how to tune in SSB. Many if not most lowcost SWL-type receivers didn't have BFOs, or the slow tuning rate and stability
needed to tune in SSB easily.

- Up until 1964 or so, a considerable part of the USA was "Conditional country" - meaning that a trip to an FCC exam point was not needed for a lot of potential hams. But around 1964, FCC changed the distance requirement from 75 to 175 miles, and increased the number of exam locations so that very little of CONUS was "Conditional country"
anymore.
This meant a lot of hams who wanted Generals or above had to travel considerable distances to an FCC exam session, rather than going a few miles to a local ham acting as a volunteer examiner.

> > If incentive licensing was so awful, why was there so much > > growth in the ARS in the two decades after it was put in > > place?

> Can you imagine how much more growth we'd have had without its repressive > effects on our hobby!

What repressive effects? The Novice and Technician did not really change under IL,
except that the Novice license term was extended to two years in 1967.
The upgrade to General was the same. Advanced just required another written test.

And the tests weren't all that hard, really, even back then. I got the Advanced at age 14, in the summer between 8th and 9th grades. Extra two years later, and it only took that long because of the experience requirement. How "hard" could it have been if even a self-taught-in-radio kid with no hams in the family could do that?

I remember how much wailing and gnashing of teeth there was back then.
I was amazed that experienced hams were so intimidated by having to take another test or two. And this was in the Philadelphia metro area, where getting to an FCC exam
session meant a quick subway ride, not a long cross-country journey.

But since about the mid 1980s, we've been told that the requirements are "too high"
and they keep being lowered. Yet the growth resulting isn't sustained.

Maybe the very people we want to attract are those who want a challenge.

No, those are called SEMAPHORE FLAGS. Those are useless at night

The flags crossed, overlaid by a single torch, appear as the

Oh, my, you'll have to tell all the illustrators everywhere that their techniques are "dying!" All the lithography producers

Oh, my, all that commotion! :-)

I love humor. Too bad you don't display any.

Yes, yes, on and on with the Philly stuff. :-)

Franklin died in 1790. The first morse code wasn't used until 1844. "Radio" was still very unknown as to what it was in 1844.

You mean UNIFORM Code of Military Justice? :-)

I knew full well what it "stood for." I was subject to it for four years of active duty in the United States Army.

>You made a mistake.

Oh HORRORS! A MISTAKE! :-)

Let's see...this is the year 2005...and the last time I wore a full U.S. Army UNIFORM was in 1956. That's 49 years in the past. I still have one set of winter, one set of summer UNIFORM clothing in a clothing bag stored in the empty space of the guest room at the southern house. All mine. Has the last four digits of my Army serial number stamped on the clothing. Do you have anything like that? I don't think so.

I don't really care one lil bitty rat snit about those "other analyses." :-)

I did mine. The Commission knows it. That's enough for me.

By the way, as of 2 PM EST on 2 December 2005, there were exactly 3,800 filings in WT Docket 05-235.

Haven't you been keeping up?

"Jealous" of Joe Speroni? The Hawaiian Morseman?

Hardly. All his Petitions before the Commission have been DENIED.

Speroni's have been DENIED in WHOLE. :-)

Tsk, my SUGGESTION to the Commission (filed on 13 January 1999) on page 14 of my 14-page Reply to Comments wasn't even mentioned in FCC 99-412, the R&O for Restructuring. :-)

Those are the breaks in regulatory politics. :-)

>You see facts and truth as hostile, Len. Your problem, not mine.

Nope, NOT "my problem." You are simply hostile to anyone who won't accept morse code wholeheartedly. You insist on keeping the code test and don't have any valid reasons for doing so except for canned phrases that were conditioned into your mind by the league.

Why ARE you so obsessed with putting down all who want the code test eliminated? I won't matter to you, personally.
You will retain your full amateur rank-status-privileges
regardless of whether the code test goes away or stays.

Not to worry. There will always be some morseperson around to play with you in your morse playground.

Oh, my...do you carry a "shield" that states you are an "official" radio person "authorized by the federal government" or something like that?

Tsk, tsk, you ought to hang around truck stops and butt in

First you said the FCC "said something to me," now you say

You contradict yourself.

None of what?

You have no DD-214 form. You will never have a DD-214 form.

Hey, no problem with me. Dudly the Imposter probably does all your fantasizing for you. :-)

Wow! Several months ago I was looking at the Burbank HRO store station, even tweaked a transceiver dial to tune in a SSB signal clearer! Hey, get the surveilance camera tapes! You might find me on them doing that! Wowee! You can make an ARREST!

You might even make the cover of QST for doing that! Fame!

Near-COMPLETE Ignorance! :-)

My acting would return Hollywood productions back to the silent era. :-)

Not to worry. I'll wait patiently for amateur agents of the UNIFORM Code of Amateur Morsemanship Excellence (UCAME) to arrest me for "cowardice" and "being a bad role model", perhaps some unspecified "charges" which are considered heretical to

And mine are only 8X for DVDs and 40X on CDs. <sigh> Left behind
again<:-))

BTW I live about 14 miles from the world's largest Poly crystal Silicon supplier. I think they also sell wafers. (very large wafers).

In 1960 a single crystal rod of the best purity you could get sold for $165 a gram. Today the poly is of higher purity than those 10 pass, float zone refined rods and as I recall it sells for something like a couple bucks a Kilo. . Back then a single crystal rod of 3/4" diameter and 16" long was about the biggest thing you'd see with poly rods about the same size.
Now days wafers are running some where between 10" and 14". I'm not sure the current size as I've been away from it for a long time. Poly crystal rods are huge. It takes power hoists to move them.

Some time in the late 60's (as I recall) they were able to change to a new method of sawing wafers which reduced the waste by about 50% or a little better. At least one firm went out of business as overnight they had doubled the single crystal yield with no increase in, cost, time, or labor.

Last week there was an article in the local paper that the plant is undergoing another expansion. Not just an expansion, they are doubling the plant capacity and they are already the world's largest supplier but a good margin.

They have gone from a small operation in a cement block garage while using an old two story farm house for an office building to one huge complex.

Think about the amount of silicon used in a transistor, CPU die, or even the CCD in a camera which is probably the largest typical die and then think of the thousands of metric tons of the stuff this place produces.

The engineering costs to produce any particular IC or CPU are high, but once in mass production it drops to almost unbelievable levels. Remember CPUs starting out at a $1000 dollars or more and in about a year of so they are less than a $100 and often still in production. They end up being dropped from production, not because they are losing money as they aren't, but the new stuff brings a premium price so it's a no brainer to make the switch. Sure the price is high so they can write off the engineering costs in a hurry, but they are still making a healthy profit.

The same is true for tuners, decoders, converters, and other set top boxes. As that stuff is mass produced and there is a tremendous market for it, they will be moving to one and two chip designs dropping the costs to a couple of dollars where the broadcasters and cable companies can give them away with each subscription.

A nearby company purchased a large batch of high quality 19 or 20" LCD monitors. The cost was some where in the low $200 range. What was the price on those just a year ago, or two years ago if you could find one that large? <:-)) Currently the price is one of supply and demand for those. They could be sold far cheaper to the individual and it won't be long before they are.

Now If I could just convince my wife of all the good reasons for getting rid of the old 19" CRTs here and going to 21" LCDs. <:-))

I hate to say, or admit this, but I remember when the new TV sets finally came out with 21" CRTs <:-)) and those *were*expensive* Carried forward to today's dollars they cost more than one of the big 50 some inch plasma sets.

The only thing I think we have on here that's relevant is a spring full of crocodile tears.

I can remember someone on here who went 'screaming' to 'the plods'
when someone wrote a letter to a family member; who made a complaint to a university vice-chancellor because an employee sent an e-mail three minutes after the end of his working day (and so must have written it in 'works time'); and who approached someone's head teacher regarding his appearance on here. Doubtless there were other incidents. He also referred to people who belonged to a tear-or-wrist organisation as 'noble'. It seems that what was good enough for him is not too good for anyone else.

Perhaps his latest sock-puppet is a reference to the time he dropped a ball by saying that a spring-dashpot system was a mechanical analogue of a coil-capacitor system, because they both exhibit 'resonance'.

I think I was commenting on the arrogance seemingly displayed by the choice of name.

Despite having thrown off my ball and chain, I retain some old contacts
- I emailed one recently (a guy who has a research interest in psychopathology) and directed him to this NG with particular reference to certain topics.

Indeed it does. Apologize at once. When I accept it we can move on.

Where's the apology that I'm due?

Amateur Radio might have been mainstreamed. Instead it remains a basement or attic activity, hidden from view by most Americans.

"Amateur Radio?" Isn't that like CB?

I don't doubt it! Someone might take up a study of the ng for a PhD thesis - except that some on here would claim in error that the

That's why Cop McDonald had a regular column in the counter-culture in that magazine.

K8MN might be able to answer that. He was so upset by not getting to play DXer from Vietnam that he made a career change because of it.

These are the numbers of current, unexpired amateur radio licenses held by individuals on the stated dates, and the percentage of the total number of active licenses that class contains:

As of May 14, 2000:

Novice - 49,329 (7.3%)
Technician - 205,394 (30.4%)
Technician Plus - 128,860 (19.1%)
General - 112,677 (16.7%)
Advanced - 99,782 (14.8%)
Extra - 78,750 (11.7%)

Total Tech/TechPlus - 334,254 (49.5%)

Total all classes - 674,792

As of November 30, 2005:

Novice - 26,885 (4.1%) [decrease of 22,444]
Technician - 273,794 (41.4%) [increase of 68,400]
Technician Plus - 44,527 (6.7%) [decrease of 84,333]
General - 135,094 (20.4%) [increase of 22,417]
Advanced - 74,373 (11.2%) [decrease of 25,409]
Extra - 107,281 (16.2%) [increase of 28,531]

Total Tech/TechPlus - 318,321 (48.1%) [decrease of 15,933]

Total all classes - 661,954 (decrease of 12,838)

Note that these totals do not include licenses
that have expired but are in the grace period.

They also do not include club, military, RACES or other station-only licenses.

Note also that effective April 15, 2000, new Novice, Technician Plus and Advanced licenses > are no longer issued.
Since April 15, 2000, FCC has renewed all existing Technician Plus licenses as Technician. It is therefore informative to consider the totals of the two classes, since the Technician class includes a significant number of Technician Plus licenses renewed as Technician.

No one needs an excuse for returning a favor, Brain.

You have your way of "misbehaving", I respond in kind.

You want to act a certain way but have everyone treat YOU with the "respect" of an elder statesman.

Ain't happening as long as you keep up YOUR silliness, Bucko.

"Attack"...?!?!

There's that Morganesque "victim" mode again, Brain.

You ridicule and "diss" me, yet think because you call me "Steve"
in the process, it's OK.

It's an all-or-nothing thing, Brain.

It's "Jim" while the spotlight's on you.

I'll tell you what...

You create a thread that answers MY questions about why YOU participate in unilateral name calling and ridiculing of people who don't do it to you (although you chide others for "name calling") along with an apology to them for doing it (and we know who the "them" is I have in mind...) and I will work one up for you.

His alleged "dyslexia" is nothing of the sort. He claims an IQ of 248 and expertise in computer technology yet he can't download and use a spellchecker.

Markie needs to find a different "condicton" to suffer from...He's

See what, Brain?

When in the last 8 years have I hit this group with almost 250 posts in a four day period? Especially with the WAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAY outlandish stuff he's ginning up.

He's not responding "in-kind" to anything. I'd ask you to find the period in time where you think I did anything of the kind, but I am sure there's some good "reason" why you won't...

In your dreams, landlubber! Just a couple of examples for you.....

The USS Constitution, homeported at Boston, is a commissioned US Navy ship (in fact the flagship of the US Navy) with a full active duty crew of sailors. Not a museum (the museum is across the street from her berth).

The USCG Barque Eagle, homeported at the Coast Guard Academy in Connecticutt, is a working training ship, used in training future seagoing officers.

No, they're not. Semaphore and wigwag are two different things.
Look it up.

In a way, yes. They're keeping a tradition alive. Those sailing vessels aren't used for actual Navy or Coast Guard operations other than training and display.

It's amateur radio, not "hobby" radio...

You sure made a lot of noise about them, though. Yet you couldn't find them even though they were right in the comments you claim to have read and understood.

I think you didn't really read and understand all the comments.

Yes, Len, we know you can't deal with facts and opinions different from your own.

Yes. You're obviously very jealous. Green with envy. Your behavior shows it.

There you go, acting all jealous and envious because someone did a better analysis than you did.

You don't have any Petitions before the Commission, Len. You're too afraid to write one and have it DENIED.

Yep - it wasn't worth the Commission's time or effort.

More important, you didn't follow the rules on Reply Comments back in 1999. Reply Comments are only supposed to be a reply to comments made by others - they are not supposed to bring up new suggestions. If you wanted to suggest an age requirement, the time to do that was during the Comment period, not the Reply Comment period. You're just as guilty of procedural mistakes as the folks who send in comments
long after the deadline.

That's simply not the case, Len. You're completely wrong on that.

things.

It's not about those things at all, Len. It's about what's good and bad for the Amateur Radio Service. I see the code test as being a good thing for the Amateur Radio service.

Not me, Len. I said you were afraid - and you are. People are afraid of all sorts of things. You were afraid to let your neighbors build two-story houses....

I didn't say you had no guts, Len.

But you sure don't display any courage or bravery here....

The interesting aspect of the renewed Tech+ as simply Techs is that from that 4/15/00 date onward there really is no way for anyone to know if a particular tech operating in the Novice segments of HF is actually authorised to do so since the FCC database doesn't record the prior tech+ status, nor does it reflect if/when a tech may have obtained a 5wpm CSCE certificate after 4/15/00.

Hmmm - are you sure the database doesn't show the previous license class, Bill?

The only HF privileges allowed to Novices and code-tested Techs are Morse Code on parts of 80/40/15/10, and some 10 meter SSB. So if you hear a Tech operating Morse Code, chances are they could pass the test anyway.
Which only leaves 10 ssb.

If you look at the enforcement letters from FCC, they have gone after Techs for operating HF in excess of their privileges. But such violations have always been obvious, like a Tech operating 20 or 40 meter SSB.

I do know that FCC expects Techs who have passed a code test to retain license documents proving that fact.

FCC has put some real oddities into the code-tested-Tech rules.

For example, if someone can produce a license document from before February 14, 1991 that clearly says "Technician", they get credit for Element 1. If they can produce a license document that clearly says
"Novice" or "Technician Plus", they also get credit for Element 1.
These rules apply even if the documents are for a license that expired

decades
ago, and even if the person holds no current license.

But a CSCE for Element 1 that is more than 365 days old conveys no test element credit at all. Yet if the person with the expired Element 1 CSCE is a Technician, that person retains their HF privileges.

Seems to me that FCC expects that active hams who are Techs should simply get a General or Extra. If the NPRM is enacted, Techs who are not code tested will have to get a General or Extra to get any HF at all.

I am off doing other things having loaded a program free agent with flames to contine to dispense. i'll be making lunch doing other stuff while my PC conitues full bore on flamethrower mode

this of course let memake one final point about stevie (wait for I'll get there)

Negitve attacking or flaming is easy, with a bit of work I start up the flame thrower and leave it for while do it for me without even typing a single letter if I choose. that is some thing we should know from watching the level of political debate

Stevie has been using negitive tactics here for years (they are easy) that makes him lazy

then he whines becuase someone that has help run a professional attack ads squences show him how it can truely done, and I am not even ramping up to full bore with a bit of work I do so much much that stevie can't begin to respond. it is call a saturation attack. it would leave the NG unable to funtion at all.

I have not condcutied that level of attacks as can be seen by the fact the various threads go on and for the next mix of automated attack I have something new in mind it will require me to type about 10-20 new letters and the attack posts will satrt up a sequenece where when some NG reader/writer system go to work will add to the level of attack on stevie stay truned Iam all but certain that stevie will step up and demand thissort of treatement

free feel to dispoint me steve

The database does show the previous license class. I just looked up my brother, a Tech Plus, who just renewed. The ULS data now shows Tech with the previous license class listed as Tech Plus.

However if they passed the Element 1 after 4/15/05, it won't show.

Actually the NPRM clearly states that very thing. And they refer to it as taking a relatively simple written test, or words to that effect, to upgrade to General.

As far as I can see, the FCC in all the various historical changes has never wanted people to remain at the introductory license even when the changes were poorly implemented. It has always looked like their goal was to get people to expand their knowledge/skills and move up in license class.

We will never know for sure whether it had a beneficial or adverse effect on the hobby. Although it may have made it harder to get full privileges, it seems to have made it easier to get beginner and intermediate privileges. The prospective ham could take the journey in smaller steps and have meaningful privileges along the way. Although the implementation was poorly handled (i.e. some people actually losing privileges), the concept of having a series of smaller, easier to manage steps makes sense if you want to get people involved in the hobby. They don't have to go all out to sample the hobby. They can get basic privileges and see if they like it before they dive into it fully.

Personally I think that the previous 5 license approach was too many and that 3 steps is about right. However as far as the written test material goes, I think the jump in difficulty from Tech to General is too small and the jump from General to Extra is too large.

Re: Governor Romney's Uninformed Remarks about ham radio <---(title only for this NG)

A former Massachusetts citizen, I grew up in in Swampscott, winning my ham radio license at age 13 in 1952.

More than once, I can recall when hams were essential because of adverse weather conditions that cut communications. One was during a hurricane in the 50's. My friend (Aaron Fishman of Sherborne, K1BAF) and I manned his car atop Highrock Hill, high ground in Lynn so as to hear and reach the weakest signals, like hand helds.

I can remember the howling winds, the car shaking, and the engine running to provide power. When it was written up in the Lynn Item, Aaron and I got no credit, but I recall that wasn't important.

What was important was the ethic of being a communication's foot soldier in time of need. That same ethic continues to the present time.

Hams are trained in efficient communications and in getting a signal out with very little. Hams represent a fountain of communications expertise, and that is why we are licensed by the federal government. (We are truly a national resource.)

A governor cannot know everything, and this is apparently a blind spot. However, I'm hoping Governor Romney can come up to speed on this subject, because it is one near and dear to the some 500,000 practitioners in the United States and to those whom they routinely help, like the National Weather Service.

frankly US mail might more effective

but the rpoblems with Ham radio today is Ham themselves

look at Steve and Dave and Dan from here

nothing is their own fault the porblem is always that other refuse to work with them

Hams like these folks are making the use of Ham radio in offcial emergancy channels more and more expensive in frustarion man hours than it used to be and as document for by Dan the served agencies are refusing to pay the price of using the ARS

this leaves Ham radio in big emergencies with only the role of trying to gaurd the falnks of EMS in passing HW traffic so that people don't bother the EMS with it you comoents on Skywarn and stuff like is more on target but ham IMO needto deal with the fact many served agencies think "we don't work or play well with others"

Neat sounding theory, but that isn't the way it happened.

Dis-incentive licensing which went into effect in the fall of 1968 did not introduce any new "steps".

Those "steps" originated at the restructuring in the early 50's when the six-class license structure was put in place.

From the introduction of that license structure in early 50's until 1968, all the top 4 license classes had exactly the same privileges. The license structure (and the test structure) remained the same after dis-incentive licensing was introduced.

Well, sort of, Dee.

The requirements for Novice didn't change at all. The requirements for Tech
did not change until 1987, when the single written that had been used for both Tech and General was split into two elements.

> The prospective ham could take the journey in smaller steps and have

That was the genius of the Novice license.

What really torqued off a lot of hams was that for all the time they'd been hams,
the General/Conditional had been the top license for all intents and purposes. Sure, the Advanced still existed, but it was closed to new issues and conveyed no additional operating privileges. The Extra was there too, and a few thousand hams got one, but again there wasn't much reason to get one.

What IL did was move the finish line a lot further away.

So for most post-1952 hams, the license process consisted of learning enough to get a Novice, using the Novice year to learn enough to get a General or Conditional, and then enjoying full amateur privileges. IL added two more license steps to full privileges, and the tests for those two steps were not usually available by mail.

Some might say that there were actually three or four steps added - two written tests and one or two code tests (depending on whether you consider the sending and receiving code tests as one or two).

If it were up to me there would be four steps, and all four would contain a mix of HF, VHF and UHF privileges. But FCC's vision is different, and they said so in the NPRM.

>From what I've read from FCC, the step from Tech to General is intentionally kept rather small to encourage Techs to upgrade to General rather than to Tech Plus
or "Tech-with-HF".

It's going to make keeping track of Val Germann/KC0MUB's Morse Code progress a problem, unless Val returns to RRAP to set the record straight.

He was the Darling of the eyes rolled back, CW Forever crowd who came on here bashing NCI. Didn't know The Code himself, but he sure was going to learn it. And he was loved for saying so.

To date, Val is not coded.

Who told you that? Not FCC. Not ARRL. Not me.

I have proposed to the FCC that the "standard" full privilege license technical requirements should be about on a par with the current Extra requirements.

And that there should be one other level, a "learners permit" with a generous term of ten years to study and gain experience to qualfity for a "full privilege" license.

Sorry to spoil your (il)logic.

You knew it was coming, I'm sure:

Why would those otherwise qualified, future seagoing officers have to jump through the sailing ship hoops when they have no intention of using anything with a sail on it. After all, couldn't they just learn to sail if they needed to? ;-)

It has been shown by the actions of the first two, and others.

First off, there's the reduction in code testing. Also code waivers. Elimination of the sending test, the one-minute-solid copy requirement, etc. But let's put those aside and look at the writtens:

1) there's the official publication of the written exams.

2) CSCEs mean the tests can be taken one at a time.

3) In March 1987 the General written was split into two elements
so that Techs no longer had to pass the full General written.

4) The content of the exams has been gradually made to cover more subjects at less depth. Want to see some study questions from the 1976 exams?

5) Instant retest means someone can try over and over as long as time and the wallet hold out.

In 2000, FCC reduced both the number of the written tests and the overall number of questions for all remaining license classes.

And yet NCVEC says we need another license class because the current Tech is "too hard".

Wow! The flagship of the US Navy is a wooden boat. I guess that just shows the differences in the services. Even if the Air Force could train it's Airmen in the Wright Flyer, we wouldn't.

The Navy probably makes all communicators learn Morse Code, too.

Been there, Hans.

"Old Ironsides" is a museum piece. A fully operational museum piece that actually sails every few years, but a museum piece nonetheless. Her main functions are educational and historic, not military.
>
> The USCG Barque Eagle, homeported at the Coast Guard Academy in Connecticutt, > is a working training ship, used in training future seagoing officers.

Does she go out on search and rescue? Or is her purpose mostly historic and educational?

I'm glad those ships are kept in operation. But in reality they are working museum pieces.

They're like the steam and first-generation diesel locomotives that a few Class 1 American railroads have kept on their rosters. Those old locos spend most of the time in storage, but are occasionally brought out and run for special purposes. They still work, meet all applicable requirements, and are technically on the active roster - but in reality they're museum pieces.

And the main point remains: Sailboats make up far less than 1% of the US military fleet.

Her "main function" is to serve as the Flagship of the Navy. That's a military function, not a "museum" function. Certainly she also serves as a "history lesson incarnate", but that is not her "main" function. If it were, she'd be property of the National Park Service, not the Department of Defense.

And to answer the comment of Clown Prince of Spamalot (aka KB9RGZ), many US Navy ships are not intended to "sail into battle" (a quaint phrase, but it reveals your ignorance of military matters). YTB's tugs don't "sail into battle", DSRV's don't "sail into battle", AD's don't "sail into battle", AOE's don't "sail into battle", AS's don't "sail into battle", ATB's don't "sail into battle", ARS's don't "sail into battle", in fact CVA's don't "sail into battle", and no, the USS Constitution will not "sail into battle", but she's still a fully commissioned ship of the line in the US Navy.

>> The USCG Barque Eagle, homeported at the Coast Guard Academy

> Does she go out on search and rescue?

Probably not, but I'm sure she teachs some of the elements of SAR. Navigation is a big part of her training mission, and you can bet that includes things like plotting an expanding-squares search pattern, calculating set and drift, and other topics useful in real world SAR operations. Regardless of that, not all USCG ships "go out on search and rescue". Some go out an tend bouys. Some go out and break ice. Some go out on training missions. Etc., etc., etc.

> Or is her purpose mostly historic and educational?

Very little "historic" about the Eagle. Her purpose is a training ship for Coast Guard Midshipmen. That's just as much a "purpose" as SAR.

> And the main point remains: Sailboats make up far > less than 1% of the US military fleet.

Nobody is trying to argue that point, are they? By the same token, CVA's make up a tiny percent of the US military fleet also, as do ARS's, AOE's, DSRV's, LPH's, and a host of other types. Doesn't make their mission any less important, or relegate them to "nothing more than museum pieces".

Ding ding, ding ding, ding ding, ding ding. Eight bells and all's well.

In case it escaped your attention, Mark, all the sailors now serving on USS Arizona are deceased and it is designated as a military cemetary. It was stricken from the rolls of the registry of US Naval vessels in 1942.

The USS Constitution is designated as the Flagship of the US Navy. It is commissioned as an active ship in the US Navy and carries a crew of about 45 active duty officers and enlisted ranks.

Pay attention Mark. I'll type slow so you can keep up.

The Chief of Naval Operations (CNO) is the senior military officer of the Department of the Navy (that makes him a military officer).

The CNO is a four-star admiral (that makes him a military officer) and is responsible to the Secretary of the Navy for the command, utilization of resources and operating efficiency of the operating forces of the Navy (that makes him a military officer).

A member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the CNO is the principal naval adviser to the President and to the Secretary of the Navy on the conduct of war (that makes him a military officer), and is the pricipal adviser and naval executive to the Secretary on the conduct of activities of the Department of the Navy (that makes him a military officer).

This high ranking military officer has as his flagship the USS Constitution. Can't get much more "military" than that.

Ding ding, ding ding. Four bells and all is well.

You're right. I'd know if I had a braijn. Yours plays tricks on you?
Why not fire him and hire a new braijn? My excuse is that I don't think I could afford to pay the going rate for a fully trained braijn.

Well, Hans, it looks like we have different definitions of "museum piece" and
"military function". I'll defer to your definitions because the USS Constitution is, in fact, the Flagship of the US Navy and is fully operational, with a full time
crew. She just doesn't sail very often.

Actually, I suppose that a considerable number of ships would intentionally
sail away from battle, because they're not meant to be combat ships.

Len was. He seems to be unable to deal with analogies.

Of course. But they're all "power boats", not "sailboats".

Nor is the Constitution's mission unimportant - although some folks don't value history very much...

Speaking of sailboats, there was at least one use of sail on a USN submarine
- and it was in the 20th century.

In May of 1921, submarine R-14 was in the Pacific on a search-and-rescue for fleet tug Conestoga. Somehow the R-14 crew managed to run the boat out of fuel.

So they sewed mattress covers and blankets together, and using the torpedo loading derrick, made a sail. After 5 days sailing, R-14 arrived in Hilo, Hawaii.

Correction to earlier posting:

Some sources say the R-14 ran out of fuel; others say she lost her powerplant and could not effect repair at sea.

Some sources say the periscope was used as the mast, others refer to the torpedo loading crane.

In any event the sub made it to port under sail:

outlandish claims or demands, or merely as an opportunity to call

There is no shame in being Reserves (or Guard). America needs all of it's service people. All have a role. Then there are those who served "in other ways" or who have "real military service" without having been in the service at all. Lots of people with lots of issues on RRAP.

ieSpell - A Spell Checker for Internet Explorer Introduction
ieSpell is a free Internet Explorer browser extension that spell checks text input boxes on a webpage. It should come in particularly handy for users who do a lot of web-based text entry (e.g. web mails, forums, blogs, diaries). Even if your web application already includes spell checking functionality, you might still want to install this utility because it is definitely much faster than a server-side solution. Plus you get to store and use your personal word list across all your applications, instead of maintaining separate ones on each application.

Don't be too hard on Jimmie, Hans, he learned all his "military

Most civilians don't understand that every servicemember does NOT "go into battle." Somehow they think that "battle" is like a street gang fight between small groups. Problem is, "battle" can catch up to everyone in the military service when no one is expecting it. The USS Indianapolis' crew found that out late in WW2 when it was torpedoed and sunk by a Japanese submarine. The Army found that out during the Battle of the Bulge...where every soldier, regardless of MOS, were suddenly IN "battle." Ever since the U.S. Army has made it a point to continue basic battle training long after soldiers have finished basic training.

Jimmie Noserve and Der Klunk both thought of Japan as "rear area" in the 1950s...a place where all are "safe." However, the USSR did have a combat reach into Japan and did have the special weapon. The USA, USAF, and USN all knew that and tried to prepare for it. Now, they might or might not have been Soviet "Bear" bombers when I was in Japan...the exact type is irrelevant...but they did have aircraft that could reach the Kanto Plain area of Honshu (where Tokyo is located). Jimmie wanted to make a Big Thing about USSR aircraft so that he could make message points and show everyone how "good" and "expert" he is. Jimmie was never in danger of anything but diaper rash in the 1950s.

Jimmie might have been in a moderate danger zone in the 1960s
when, first, IRBMs were being targeted on east coast positions from Cuba, then later, from ICBMs that were targeted all over the USA. Right now he is acting like an acting secretary of the navy with his navel history. [no Oscars for him...]

Follows the USN academy pattern in that, yes? I thought Annapolis had their own "tall ship" for midshipman sailing training? Lots of other nations' naval academies have those...most were present at the "Parade of the Tall Ships" on TV here in 1976 during the U.S.
Bicentennial celebrations.

My name isn't mentioned once in the five-volume bound set of Title 47 C.F.R. Not in any Part therein.

The ONLY place where my name appeared was on the Government Post Office shippling label that sent me those five volumes.

Show us WHERE my name, with appropriate statement of "unqualifications" appears in Title 47 C.F.R.

Tsk. It's something you've NEVER done, Jimmie.

I decided it was time to serve my country and volunteered to do so during a war time. You've done NOTHING like that at any time.

>Not me, Len.

We KNOW that, Jimmie. You've NEVER done that.

>I said you were afraid - and you are.

"Afraid of what?" :-)

>People are afraid of all sorts of things.

You must have been AFRAID to risk your precious body in real military service since you didn't volunteer. <shrug>

>You were afraid to let your neighbors build two-story houses....

W R O N G .

NOT "afraid." MY neighbors did not want the development started that would cut off our view...so much so that we all formed an action committee and we presented our case to the zoning commission in a regular meeting. That VACANT land (about 15 acres) was then UNdeveloped. The contractor won a change of zoning from only Residential to Residential-with-apartments...the existing neighbors lost that fight.

The contractor went bankrupt, couldn't develop the land, sold the land to another contractor. THAT contractor built 44 homes (average price $500,000 five years ago) after spending 9 months of re-arranging the vacant land. Our (original 'neighbors') views' were spoiled by those new homes.

My neighborhood was NOT "afraid." We took ACTION. That is recorded in the minutes of the City Zoning Commission's meetings. Okay, we neighbors tried and lost. That's the breaks in politics.

What you've done is to RE-WRITE what was originally written in here with some weird spin on "courage" and "fear" that YOU invented, fabricated, LIED about. That shows the kind of hostility you exhibit in here. ["Google provides"]

>But you sure don't display any courage or bravery here....

How so, Lord High Whatever?

Is it something about "not following YOUR orders/commands?!?"

Fork you, yer Lordship...you don't get to GIVE orders in here.

You are NOT QUALIFIED to give orders, you are NOT AUTHORIZED to give orders. You aren't even QUALIFIED to be a barracks lawyer, yet you pretend to be one with your "rules" on comment content!

Morse code testing for an amateur radio license is then also a "museum piece" of no educational or historic (nor military) need.

There are many morse code museums around the USA to display the "educational and historic needs" for morse code...no federal license testing is needed to keep up those museums.

If morse code is so damn good as a communications mode, then it will survive quite well on its own WITHOUT federal license testing requirements. Strange that all other radio services of the USA quit using morse code for communications...

Why? You are NOT in the USN or USCG, have never served in uniform.

You are NOT INVOLVED.

Those old choo-choos are in the military? Do prospective Army "cruises" also? I think not. :-)

Do those old choo-choos use morse code for communications?

Bad on me...I thought that AMATEUR RADIO LICENSING was the "main

Indeed. All he has to do is digitize and make available his DD-214 (blotting out privacy entries such as SSN if he is Might be a messed up attribution. Air Force personnel readily respond to "Airman," "wingnut," or "hey Sarge."

But they know what the MOS is, and what the Navy equivalent is. To pretend that they don't is to visit Dave's World of self-imposed ignorance and strong desire to be offended.

The Air Force has the Specialty Code, or AFSC. Asking an Airman what their "job" is will usually evoke a correct response. The Air Force requires one to have a high school diploma for recruitment. We also issue the DD-214 upon discharge.

Hopefully not the "com" mode, although I did visit an installation that Was this thread about "sailboats?" Hot darn, I coulda sworn it was all about Replies to Comments on NPRM 05-143!

>In May of 1921, submarine R-14 was in the Pacific on a search-and-rescue for

Did the USN use the term "search-and-rescue" then, olde-tyme Mister Mariner?

Do you understand how FAR BACK in time 1921 is? Hint: 84 years!

Why are you dredging up so much muck of the PAST? Especially when this new misdirection isn't even close to NPRM 05-143 subject?

>Somehow the R-14 crew managed to run the boat out of fuel.

"...run the boat out of fuel?!?"

Did they fire up the spark transmitter on battery power and make a DASH for port with their code key?

Didn't the crew hop on the long crankshaft like they did on the Hunley?

Jimmie boy, I think you've run out of fuel on this thread. Crude.

Jimmie, ALL manned submarines made after WW2 have a SAIL.

One could argue that is making the test
more difficult...depending on the individual.

Hasn't that been recently changed? Even if not, I don't know of any VE group that allows retesting on the smae test at the same test session.

Hasn't the ARRL said the same thing by proposing a new beginners

That's a good thing! The District of Columbia was invented

The nation's capital is nowhere near California, either...

There are none so blind as those who will not see. You can deny all you want, but 55% of those individuals who expressed a preference in comments on 05-235 supported at least some Morse Code testing. Only 45% supported complete removal of all Morse Code testing. That's a "vote for CW" to anyone who thinks rationally.

Of course the FCC doesn't have to follow that "vote" and probably won't. But to deny its existence is to deny reality.

Yes. Your analysis counts those who file multiple comments as if they are separate opinions. As if the wordiest person's opinion somehow counts more because they typed more.

If someone had written Reply Comments to every procodetest comment, your system would have counted them as separate opinions even though they had the same author. That's not a valid way of analyzing opinion. In short, it stinks.

Your name is not in the FCC database of amateur radio licenses.
Therefore
you are not qualified.

Being the control operator of an amateur radio station. You are not qualified to do that - have never been qualified. I've been qualified, and doing that, since 1967.

How do you know?

Besides, you seem to think that one brave act means all must defer to your opinions and whims. Doesn't work that way.

Would you have volunteered to fight in Vietnam in 1972?

You were afraid of how the neighborhood would change.

Just your neighbors? Or you too?

In other words, you and your neighbors wanted to stop other people from building certain types of buildings on their own land - because it would mess up your view.

So what?

So they were worth more than your house....

How does anyone "rearrange" land? With a bulldozer?

44 homes on 15 acres is about a third of an acre each.
Half a million each is a starter home, right?

> Our (original 'neighbors')
> views' were spoiled by those new homes.

So - you thought your "view" was more important than the newcomers' property rights. You thought that those 15 acres should not be developed, even though you didn't own them. You resisted changes that brought in new people and more progress. You clung to the past and tried to hold back the future.

And you failed.

Yes, you were. You feared the loss of your "views".

And you FAILED.

What I find most interesting is that you fought change, progress, and newcomers. And you thought your views should count for more than the wants and needs of those who owned the land.

> What you've done is to RE-WRITE what was originally written in

What spin? What fabrication? What lies?

I simply point out that you and your neighbors feared and opposed change in the neighborhood. That's the truth.

How?

Hans says the USS Constitution is not a "museum piece". So neither is a Morse

Why not?

The USS Constitution is supported by Federal tax dollars and Federal law.

Maybe it will. There are reports of more Morse Code activity and interest in some countries where the testing has been eliminated.
One such country is Germany.

Why is that strange? Other radio services do not have the same Definitely a lie. Steve has started more new threads (spam) than anyone around, usually to lie about another, or to call them names.

Now he cries like a little girl about getting a mega-dose of it back.
Poor little Steve.

I dunno. It's kind of interesting seeing someone "out-asshole" you, Steve. And I don't think Mark's even close to being done. My best guess is that you've really pissed him off. Can't imagine why. Hi!

You need to answer Mark's question about what a person's sexual orientation has to do with amateur radio and why you change attributions and accuse people of "raped an old friend," pedophilia,
etc.

Maybe once you apologize for being a jerk and promise to behave yourself... he will abate the very treatment that you dish out to others. Strange that you don't like it in-turn.

But it's up to Mark to accept your apology.

Meanwhile, I'm waiting for a seperate apology...

Not that I know of. The move to the VEC system was made by FCC. Making the tests public was an unavoidable consequence of the VEC system. Besides, if the FCC couldn't keep them secret from Dick Bash back when FCC made up and controlled the test distribution, how could anyone expect they could do it when the VEs ran the testing?

In the bad old days, all the elements for a particular license had to be passed at the same test session. For example, getting an Extra meant that you had to pass both code and theory at the same time. That's a tougher requirement than being able to take them separately.

It's the difference between knowing a little bit of the basics of a wide variety of subjects vs. an in-depth knowledge of fewer subjects. Most people find
the latter to be more challenging.

I posted mine voluntarily, but I certainly wasn't the first. Even John Kerry posted his military records during the 2004 campaign. Major Dud, OTOH, can't seem scrape up the pocket change for a second-hand scanner at the local Goodwill store.

<snip>
>>> Frank and I disagree on Dudly. I say Dud was NEVER IN. Frank

A couple weeks ago I realized that you're probably right -- Major Dud was never in the USMC. Maybe he was the Steven Robeson that served in the USCG (Semper Paratus), but I doubt that, too. Dud was most likely a brat that was tied to his momma's apron strings until his 30's, when some financial crisis forced him to get a job (his mommy retired and her Social Security check wasn't enough to pay for his hobbies). And instead of admitting that he wasted his early adulthood, he assumed the identity and military history of someone with the same name who he discovered while surfing the net. That's my take. It may not be 100% accurate, but I'll bet it's pretty close.

We'll never know which because Dud is too much of a coward to post the truth. And by 'coward' I mean he's a yellow, spineless, shit-talking, tail-tucking, hide-behind-the-keyboard blowhard......

I have no fear at all disclosing my military record. I don't care if people know that I was a BE but now work at a bartender (which I actually like better than being a BE). I'm not rich or famous -- never have been and never will be. I'm no hero (wannabe or not) and I'm not afraid to admit that I would rather walk away from a fight than take a chance at getting my ass kicked. But Major Dud, self-proclaimed war hero and saver of lives, can't scarf enough valium to post his DD-214?

That's pure =-COWARDICE-=.

<snip>
> If and when I address anything to Major Dud, I will toss in the > usual ending motto for all USMC Wannabes: Temper Fry.

That won't have any effect. Dud lives in his own little fantasy world where he is morally superior and everyone else should worship him, yet at the same time he seeks validation of those fantasies by engaging in flame wars on Usenet. IOW, you can't hurt his delusions of persecution by feeding them. What Dudly fears most is the truth, and that's how he will go down -- in a fireball of facts:

Fact: Dudly didn't know which targets were used in boot camp.

Fact: Dudly didn't know that avionics techs are routinely assigned to the FMF.

Fact: Dudly has claimed to have several DD-214's -and also- has claimed to have only one.

Fact: Dudly didn't know what info is recorded on a DD-214.

Fact: Dudly fell into the "box 24" trap.

Fact: Dudly fell into the shore patrol / military police trap.

Fact: Dudly didn't know some routine USMC terminology.

Fact: Dudly didn't know what page of the SRB is used to record crimes and punishments (after claiming to have witnessed several NJP's... he probably doesn't even know what 'NJP' stands for).

Fact: Dudly didn't know the different types of military discharges.

Fact: Dudly didn't know the promotion process for the USMC.

Fact: Dudly didn't know about the VINSON system; that the system was in service for a large part of his alleged service; and that the crypto system which he claimed was the -only- crypto system on USMC aircraft during his alleged 'career' was retired ten years before his discharge/separation.

And here's the biggie:

Fact: Dudly has proved that he is more than willing to provide proof of any claim -- if he has it!!!

Both. Both in Petitions, one that was already denied in part, the

Tsk, Dud could go to any Kinko's, Office Depot, Office Max store and get his DD-214 scanned. I'm sure the Hospital where he says he works has a scanner someplace that would do it for free...

I can go for the USCG part. Years ago Dud made a big thing of his father's death (father was a ham) for a long time and said his father had been in the USN, "taught him the code" etc., was "his mentor." OK, a little bit of that was fine, but Dudly dragged it out in here.

Dud has never mentioned his mother. Dud doesn't talk much of his first marriage, either. <shrug>

But, the interesting part is that this alleged E-7 changed from an "avionics tech" to nursing just doesn't wash well. Especially when Dud was so macho gung-ho about being a "warrior." [see online pipedreaming about "doing HALO drops" and other heroic battle things] Now it DOES fit that Dud - as a former CG pharmacist's mate - COULD make a transition from military pill dispensing to being a civilian nurse.

Not a problem on finding those with similar names. I went looking for others with MY name and - surprisingly - found that a Major Leonard Anderson, USMC, was one of the pilots in the Blue Angels!
How about that, a Marine (real) Major in a precision aerobatic team! :-)

Back when I was taking Basic Training at Camp Gordon (it wasn't renamed as a Fort yet), the First Sergeant told me to report to the JAG office there, but didn't know any more about it than I.
I did, showed all my ID there, got puzzled looks, showed my dog tags too. Seems a black guy in the previous group of trainees was also named Leonard Anderson and had lost his ID card, had applied for a new one. I had mine, so no problem.
I went back to Basic Company 7 to the grins of the First Soldier and a couple clerks (JAG had called them to verify the same name in two different groups). :-)

I doubt he qualified on the range. Does the USCG make

If he had to go to sea, it would have been the last of him.

None of which we have seen.

That Separation form has been out and used by all branches for over a half century. Very few changes in it over that time.
Each block has a short description of what should go in there on the form itself.

>Fact: Dudly fell into the "box 24" trap.

Actually, anyone could if they didn't have one to look at. :-)

>Fact: Dudly fell into the shore patrol / military police trap.

Interesting. It's a very clear distinction to anyone who's been IN the military and been near another branch.

>Fact: Dudly didn't know some routine USMC terminology.

That's surprising, given the popularity of military shows on TV. :-)

Heh. Well, "SRB" to me is the acronym for the strap-on booster rockets of the space shuttle. :-)

>Fact: Dudly didn't know the different types of military discharges.

He probably made his own "discharge" dreaming of his military heroism. :-)

>Fact: Dudly didn't know the promotion process for the USMC.

Very surprising. All of those who stayed in longer than their first hitch would be VERY cognizant of the rank and promotion system in every military branch.

In retrospect, that was just bluff on his part. He just doesn't know dink about military avionics, period. He's never mentioned one single familiar name or nomenclature of any avionics he ever laid hands on...for seven years... until last week when Hans tromped on his "Juliett" claim.
Anyone who takes pride in their radio-electronics work will be willing, even eager, to talk shop on that stuff.

Several years ago, when Dudly was pressed on the matter of names/nomenclature of military electronics, he tried to bluff his way out with some blabbering about "secrecy" and "not wanting to reveal military secrets." Total bullshit that was since the names and nomenclatures have been in public distribution for years in the DoD and GAO...along with the makers and the contract amounts. That includes crypto gear that was out in the field. I used to subscribe to the free trade magazine "Defense Electronics" for months and in that each month was a column of names/numbers/awards/makers/etc.
so that those in the industry could tell who got what. I even posted a link for anyone to get the "catalog" of Signal Corps communications equipment released in 1994, FM 24-24.
That same link has been posted on at least three other amateur radio websites before I wrote it in here. [it's

from the Army's TRADOC or Training and Doctrine Command
"digital library"] All the operating specs are in there.

>And here's the biggie:

Yeah, well that's what he says NOW. Back a few years he used to say "the proof is in my wallet" and "I don't have to show it to you!" :-) In other words, all he had in his wallet were starved-dead moths...i.e., NOTHING in the way of proof.

Spineless bullshiting hypocrite is what he is.

I connected the "dots" long ago but a bunch of the extras in SK. Most just quit posting here. That leaves - as regulars - only Robeson, Brakob, Heil, and Miccolis. Miccolis and Heil are only concerned with promoting their own inherent superiorness. Brakob vacillates between "sides" and one is never certain if he is for anything. Hans does go after certain folks as the mood strikes him...doesn't matter which "side" those are on at that moment.

Robeson, aka Dudly the Imposter, has the second-highest record of posting in this newsgroup according to Google's "top ten" list. He is topped only by Cecil Moore who left for saner venues. Dudly has unfailingly kept up a barrage of foul invective against everyone who has ever said anything contrary to his opinions...and has not YET backed up any of his claims.

Interesting situation. The remaining extras in here all SUPPORT Dudly, condone his activity, and even (Heil does that often) argue in his favor. But Dudly has this amateur extra class license, the "highest class" which is supposed to exemplify the "best" that amateur radio has to offer to all others. That only paints a picture of amateur radio as some surreally dysfunctional hobby activity where all toss invective at everyone else. Sort of a "Hello, Dali" without Barbara or pretty music...just weirdness and limp watches.

"Dots" got connected a long time ago. The finished picture is something to which all avert their eyes...lest they get sick to the stomach. Blessed be the Freedom of Speech. We can all gag on Dudly's vomit. Yuck.

So procodetest people are DETERMINED.

Who is "St. Hiram"?

Hiram Percy Maxim went to Washington DC after WW1. He and some others also went to Paris a few times in the 1920s to attend world radio conferences.

Those were good things because they helped insure the continued existence
of amateur radio.

Because you stated the FCC was LATE. To be LATE, there has to be a deadline that was exceeded.

I'm just trying to determine how the FCC was LATE.

So it took unusually long to get the NPRM into the Federal Register.
That's not the same as being LATE. Can't be LATE without a deadline.

No, it's true - according to your tally, anyway. Isn't your tally accurate? As of August 31, didn't the majority of filings support the nocodetest position?

There's none. But that's not the point! Most of those who filed comments are licensed amateurs. The six week delay did not prevent anyone from filing, nor did it somehow prevent "the public" (which includes radio amateurs) from filing comments.

Why not? Philly is a great town. Lots of history, lots of culture, lots of diversity, lots of fun.

Better than living some place where the earth shakes every so often, the hillsides either catch fire or slide away, and the people elect aging movie actors to important public offices when they're not busy trying to preserve their "views" at the expense of others' property rights.

I am torn between the "ROTMFF" laughter over his exploits to being

I have nothing to apologize to Mark Morgan for, Brain...

He was asked for an apology for the stalking, death threat, "I am a Colonel", stories for YEARS now and not a single one has been delivered.

The "in-turn" is being delivered to him, not vice versa.

I'm not whining.

You stated that I am not "civil", "moral", "truthfull [sic]" or "decent".

I pointed out that THOSE issues were YOURS to deal with, and why.

You don't have a clue as to what you're saying or suggesting.

Teaching children to "lie" at ANY level is immoral.

Nope.

Because you've proven to anyone with an IQ over 7 that you're a liar of immense proportion.

Not yesterday.

Not today.

I don't make "anonymous" complaints, Markie. I thoroughly document my concerns, package them professionally, and sign my name.

Nope. Not yet, anyway. The package for Houghton County is out

In other words, that is your opinion based on your view of certain actions of others but you have NO example where anyone has said the requirements are too high. So the reality is that we have NOT been told by anyone that the requirements are too high.

But again, that wasn't asked for by amateurs or any amateur

And again, who asked for that or drove that change?

I don't think so. It was proposed but AFAIK not acted upon.

My understanding is that some do - if you pay another fee.

Do they allow the taking of the exact same test?
I think not. I have been a VE at several sessions here in NJ and have never seen anyone allowed to take the exact same test a second time on that same session regardless of paying an additional fee. The reality also is that the VEs running the session have no desire to allow anyone to just stay all day/night until the applicant's money runs out.

In another reply to your question,
Len stated the ARRL has filed both proposals.
I'll take his word on that.

As to a new beginners license, I (me alone) would support that idea...but I think we need to approach that concept slowly by the following path:

1. FCC drops code test as currently proposed
2. The ham community (ARRL, etc) monitors closely the entrance/addition of new (i.e. never before) hams
and upgrades of existing hams for at least a couple of years.
3.After two years, we assess if any problem exists
regarding the ability to gain new hams.

I'll make you a deal...you stop trying to offer advice on MARS (any branch), unlicensed devices used in emergency comms, the ARES, the ARRL, and operating DXpeditions (all topics that you've failed miserably at anyway...) and I won't even remotely suggest anything of

The ten comendedments, huh? You're awfully big on stating that someone is "aiding and abetting" but you seem to have no sense of taking responsibility for fallout from your own action or lack of action.

I answered one of your questions and you've subsequently stated on a number of occasions that I didn't answer it. Then you've called me a liar. You'll excuse me if I choose not to answer any more of your questions, espeically when the question is about a religion which you've clearly rejected.

Here are some more examples:

- ARRL has proposed free (no test) upgrades for many hams. These proposed free upgrades included Novices and Tech Pluses getting Generals with no additional testing, and Advanceds getting Extras with no additional testing. While they don't come right out and say the requirements are too high, proposing that hundreds of thousands of hams get an upgrade without taking the required tests effectively says the test requirements - the written test requirements - are too high. Free upgrades would effectively lower the requirements.

NCI agreed with the ARRL proposal on the free upgrades, btw.
But FCC disagreed and denied all proposals for free upgrades.
FCC cited the comments of certain people in that denial - see footnote 142 in the NPRM. (ahem)

- NCVEC's "Amateur Radio In the 21st Century" paper is full of the idea that the requirements are too high, particularly for the entry-level license class. Their second proposal followed the "21st Century" paper closely.

Publicizing the exact Q&A makes the requirements lower because the prospective ham knows exactly what will be on the test, down to the exact wording, and the exact correct answers. Big difference from secret tests!

For example, in the old days we knew there would be Ohm's Law problems on the exam, possibly including series and parallel resistors, voltage dividers, power calculations and more. But we didn't know exactly what the problems to be solved would look like, so we learned to solve almost anything we could think up.

With open pools the exact form of the problem is known, and only solutions for the problems which may be on the test need be learned.

Yet they allow it. In the bad old days there was a mandatory 30 day wait to retest. Which meant a lot of us went to the test really prepared because coming back was not that easy.

He's hardly a reliable source.

ARRL proposed a new license class in 2004.
NCVEC has too, and some others. FCC denied them all.

The original 2004 ARRL proposal would have given all Techs and Tech pluses a free upgrade to General. Advanceds would get a free upgrade to Extra, too.

ARRL then proposed that the Technician then be replaced by a new entry-level license that had a balance of HF and VHF/UHF privileges, instead of the current Technician's all-VHF/UHF setup.

That part of the 2004 ARRL proposal was denied by FCC.

Now, in comments on the current NPRM, ARRL has recommended expanded privileges for all Technicians, rather than a completely new license class. The claim is that the all-VHF/UHF privileges of the Technician are not optimum for the entry-class license, and that it would be expecting too much for new hams to get a General just to get on HF - even without any code test for General.

Will probably happen regardless of anything else.

> 2. The ham community (ARRL, etc) monitors closely

> and upgrades of existing hams for at least a couple of years.

Someone would have to do this in a structured way, by downloading the entire database at regular intervals (say once a month) and analyzing it a la AH0A.

It would not be possible to determine "never before" hams as opposed to "retreads" without a lot of historic info.

Upgrades could be derived by comparing the current license class of each license with the license class from the previous analysis.

> 3.After two years, we assess if any problem exists
> regarding the ability to gain new hams.
>
Sounds reasonable, except who is going to "bell the cat" - do all the analysis work?

It's also important to understand the effect of impending changes.

If the rules are fairly stable, newcomers and potential upgraders have an incentive to pass the tests.

But if there are possible changes coming that will reduce the requirements, at least some will simply wait to see how things turn out. Why study for a test that will be gone in a few months - or one that you won't have to take because ARRL got you a free upgrade?

Sure, some will "go for it" but others will hold back.

As an example, yesterday I was in BestBuy and took a look at the HDTVs. All sorts of them on the market - and some of the older ones were being sold at clearance prices.

But I decided not to get one now, because I think the prices will come down. I don't "need" an HD set just yet, so why pay the high price now?

The Indianapolis was a warship - heavy cruiser IIRC.

How many Allied merchant and cargo ships - mostly unarmed - were sunk
by enemy action in the Battle of the North Atlantic? How many of their crews
were lost in the service of their country?

And your point is?

All sorts of people in all sorts of jobs face danger every day, Len.

The electric wires don't put themselves up, and when a storm knocks out the power, the crews don't get to wait for a sunny day to fix them.

Bridges don't paint themselves, tall buildings don't put themselves up, and oil doesn't refine itself. Somebody has to do all those hazardous jobs.

Think about what EMTs and ER personnel face every day. They see all kinds of sick and injured people, and have to try to help them.
Often they have no idea if the sick or injured person has a contagious disease, mental problem, or ulterior motive (like stealing drugs). One wrong move and they could get a fatal disease - or something even more quickly fatal.

Who said that? Not me.

Japan was a lot "safer" than Korea, during that conflict. You weren't in much danger of enemy attack then, were you?

> However, the USSR

"Special weapon"?

How many did they have, Len? How long would it take for them to get it to Tokyo in those years - if they had it?

No, it's not irrelevant, Len. You just don't like having your mistakes discovered.

You named a specific aircraft type that wasn't even deployed at the time, and understated the distance from the USSR to Japan.
Then you got all abusive (as usual) when your mistakes were pointed out - as if the mistakes were the fault of the person pointing them out!

if they could get through all the air defenses.

Who are you talking about, Len? I don't even know what "message points" are.

You tried to look like an expert and got very upset when a mere civilian pointed out and proved your mistakes. Yet you abused others who actually saw and photographed Bear bombers in flight, saying they could not have done what they did.

> Jimmie might have been in a moderate danger zone in the 1960s

There was no defense against IRBMs and ICBMs. Not even an effective way to sound the alert. 1950s Soviet bombers would take hours to get to Tokyo - if they could even get through the air defenses.
1960s ICBMs and IRBMs would be at there targets in minutes. Big cities, particularly those near the nation's capital, would be prime targets.

Hardly a "moderate danger zone".

It kind of dovetails with the successes of amateur radio because of "New" information? No. You did, indeed, provide a link for OLD information that was made obsolete in ACTUAL USE by the U.S. Army Signal Corps prior to the U.S.' entry into World War One.

Note: I am familiar with Fort Gordon as the "home" of the Signal Corps ever since it was known as Camp Gordon.
That is where I and other signalmen did our Basic Training as soldiers.

>http://www.gordon.army.mil/ocos/Museum/IMAGES/wigwag.gif

For some more information on the HISTORY of the Signal Corps, United States Army, go to:

http://www.gordon.army.mil/ocos/museum/

>> I've already worn the collar insignia of the United States Army >> Signal Corps, a torch over two crossed signal flags.
>
>The US Army also used wig wag signalling

Okay, they did up to 1912. ? This is 93 years later.

The U.S. Army ALSO used carrier pigeons and spark transmitters for communications. That ended after WW1.

The U.S. Army once used smoothbore muskets and sabers for weaponry. That ended prior to WW1.

ONE-FLAG signaling ended in 1912...according to the same museum source.

>but you don't seem to know about that.

I know far more than you ever will about what the United States Army Signal Corps has done in the last half century plus a lot more. I was IN it, you were NOT.

>I can never wear the insignia of the Signal Corps? You are >quite mistaken, Len.

Anyone can go purchase (or steal) some insignia and put it on. The entertainment business has been allowed to do that for a very long time...as COSTUMES. Play-acting. Dudly the Imposter tries to get away with his impersonation of "being a Marine."

Here's some more from Regimental Division, Office Chief of Signal, United States Army Signal Center, Fort Gordon, GA:

CROSSED FLAGS

"Crossed flags" have been used by the Signal Corps since 1864, when they were prescribed for wear on the uniform coat by enlisted ment of the Signal Corps. In 1884, a burning torch was added to the insignia and the present design adopted on 1 July of that year. The flags and torch are symbolic of signaling or communication. Two signal flags crossed, dexter flag - the flag on the right, white with red center, the sinister flag on the left, red with white center, staffs of gold, with a flaming torch of gold color upright at the center of crossed flags. Branch colors: Orange trimmings and facings were approved for the Signal Service in 1872. The white piping was added in 1902, to conform to the custom which prevailed of having piping of a different color for all except the line branches.

To explain some terms: "Line" branches are those of the Army directly involved with warfighting; i.e., infantry, artillery, armor. Infantry uniform piping is, has been, light blue. If memory serves, artillery had red piping. "Piping" was principally the thin edge trimming on the soft cap (sometimes called an "overseas cap" as well as a vulgar feminine name).

Branch COLOR is a heritage symbol, found on branch flags and, in 1950-1960 used in an issued scarf that replaced the tie for certain ceremonial functions. [I still have mine as a memento]

The "crossed flags" have been a collar insignia for enlisted signalmen for 121 years, and remains. Signal officers have a similar collar insignia (on the lapels of coats and shirts worn beneath the letters "U.S." in gold and with color added to the flags. Date of adoption of that style depends on adoption of the officer's uniform style that changed between WW1 and WW2. Enlisted collar branch insignia has been all gold, no other color, mounted on a disc of gold. Date of adoption of that collar insignia style (to differentiate officers and enlisted) unknown exactly but was done prior to WW2.

As a never-served civilian, you no doubt feel free to ridicule the U.S. military, especially in areas of tradition, heritage, heraldry, branch colors, and so forth. That is understood. Having never been a part of an active military you would be ignorant of the experience of being part of a fighting force that was born during the "Spirit of '76."

Some other facts about the U.S. Army Signal Corps:

It is the birth-branch of the United States Air Force, having issued the very first purchase of a heavier-than-air aircraft in the military (for observation purposes). Note: The USAF was once a part of the Army, the "Air Corps", but became a separate service branch in 1948.

The ubiquitous superheterodyne receiver was born in the mind of Major Edwin Armstrong while he was on duty with the United States Army Signal Corps in Paris, 1918. The "superhet" receiver has been made by the millions worldwide since then.

The first field use of balloons for observation were done during the American Civil War, including the first "airborne" telegraphy tried then between a lofted balloon and ground. [that preceded the later massive lighter-than-air ship effort of the United States Navy]

The first weather stations and their communications of weather conditions was pioneered prior to the formation of the "National Weather Service" that was absorbed by NOAA.

The first use of carrier pigeons on a large scale for communications was done just prior to and during WW1. Signal Corps developed a field-transportable pigeon coop on a vehicle. Unfortunately, the pigeons being conscripts did not want to cooperate fully and that was disbanded after WW1.

The first handheld Transceiver ("handie-talkie") was the brainchild of Galvin Manufacturing, Chicago, (legally changed to Motorola after WW2) and the Fort Monmouth Signal Office in 1940. Galvin designed, with Signal Corps' enthusiastic support, the first useable backpack "walkie-talkie" FM voice radio that saw its first baptism of fire in the Italian campaign of 1943. [SCR-300 with its 18 tube radio the BC-1000]

The Signal Corps designed, and Galvin later made, the first horse mobile radio that could be used by a cavalry-man en ride ("in motion" for you non-equine humans). The resulting "pogo stick" (for its guidon socket bottom support pole) radio chest unit may have featured the first use of a combined speaker-microphone; that combined speaker-microphone is now a standard feature of public safety manpack radios. Mounted cavalry was disbanded during WW2 but those "pogo stick" radios remained in service, seeing their baptism of fire on Guadalcanal, man-carried in infantry units.

100 Watt semi-portable spark transmitters were used by the Army Air Corps in France in 1917-1918, those lap-held units designed by the Signal Corps. [as far as can be determined, those were one-way transmissions, air to ground only due to noise of open-cockpit aircraft]

The first use of regular communications satellite message relay for military communications, Vietnam, late 1960s, using a mobile commications van containing microwave and multi-channel circuits, designed for the purpose by the Signal Corps.

The first precision target acquisition and gun-tracking radar, the SCR-584, a joint design by MIT Radiation Lab and Signal Corps, transportable, saw service in Italy and France during WW2. Signal Corps had already designed and contracted out the radar that sighted the first Japanese air attackers in Hawaii on December 7, 1941. Signal Corps is the birthplace of the SCR-584 radar replacement, the MA-1 fire-control system which featured a Luneberg lens antenna. Radar set design at Fort Monmouth was transferred to Artillery in the 1960s.

The very first moonbounce proved at Signal Corps Engineering Laboratories (just outside Fort Monmouth) in 1946. Proved that the moon can be a reflector of radio waves. See "Project Diana" for more references. That used a modified wartime radar set, including its unmodified antenna. Those laboratories were visible from the main road connecting Fort Monmouth with Red Bank, NJ. [Coles, Evans, and Squire laboratories]

With the U.S. Navy, the U.S. Army provided for the rebirth of cryptographic services in the 1930s. The Army Signal Corps established a small agency headed by William Friedman, a civilian, to organize an Army cryptographic service for military intelligence purposes. In cooperation with an equally-small unit of the U.S. Navy (under Captain Stafford) they formed the cryptologic nucleus for the entire U.S. government prior to our entry into WW2. Machinists at the Washington Navy Yard constructed a working prototype of the Japanese "Red" and "Purple" crypto machine work-alikes that were designed by the Army. Success of this led to the USN victory at the Battle of Midway. The combined service efforts resulted in a superior "rotor" cryptographic machine that was never known to be compromised until the physical capture of the USS Pueblo intelligence ship. Cryptanalysts of both USA and USN WW2 efforts later worked at the NSA (formed officially after WW2). [for more references, see the Fort Huachuca Military Intelligence Museum web page...that includes some interesting bios of the Friedmans and some pioneers in Army aircraft not normally included in popular flying lore]

The Signal Office of the U.S. Army was the head of the second-highest priority industry during WW2; Production of quartz crystal units for all branches and some allies (England, chiefly). Galvin Mfg in Chicago was the civilian center of some 60 companies producing a million units a month by the last three years of WW2. The only other production program having a higher priority then was the Manhattan Project. Signal Corps was one of the contractor backers to provide the first crystal growth processes to replace small, irregular natural quartz. That permitted much lower-cost crystal units to be used in all electronics disciplines.

I'd like to say that the Signal Corps is responsible for precision time-frequency sources useable over military field environments, but that isn't strictly true. Such is a multi-agency cooperative effort. The USN began the GPSS with a project called NAVSTAR using miniaturized atomic-resonance oscillators for a precision time-frequency reference, beginning in 1970. Theory and practical units were first done by NIST. Improvements were done by the electronics industry. Signal Corps concentrated on all-environment precision quartz crystal oscillators that resulted in the excellent frequency stability units required for the successful SINCGARS family of jam-proof, secure radios (quarter million R/Ts produced since 1987).

The head of IEEE Time-Frequency is (or was) John R. Vig, one of the theory-and-practice heads at the Central Electronics Command that was at Monmouth. SINCGARS can check or update its precision internal time base by connecting an AN/PSN-11 GPS receiver to a front panel connector. True also for its Key Fill equipment. Both got their baptism of fire in the First Gulf War 1990-1991.

I'd like to say that the Signal Corps is responsible for direct-select-frequency-synthesizer subsystems on HF transceivers, especially for SSB AM transceivers, but that would raise all sorts of hoo-haw between Collins amateur radio fanatics and several electronics industry companies, not to mention interservice rivalry by real veterans of the military. The military wasn't the first to pioneer SSB techniques in radio, the civilian communications providers were. USAF Strategic Air Command was the contracting agency that led to single-channel SSB communications mini-revolution on the amateur HF bands, resulting in SSB AM Voice being the MOST popular mode on HF by amateurs.

USAF demands in frequency-hopping technology (and USN in radar) led to secure communications and jam-proof radar use. Refinements in that led to USA frequency-hopping for field radios, extremely stable time bases that could network frequency hoppers, the net holding despite a hop rate of 10 carrier frequency changes per second.

Who made vacuum tubes producible at a reasonable cost in the USA? Look up Western Electric, the old manufacturing arm of the Bell System (you know, the telephone infrastructure giant that "fails during every emergency"). Who invented the transistor? Two scientists at Bell Labs (with help of Bill Shockley). Signal Corps wasn't first there.

I could probably expand on all the preceding if I had the time to do real research, provide a whole list of end-notes and bibliography. The above I can write from memory without looking up a thing. I was a REAL signalman, a soldier serving in the Army of the United States. I did REAL HF (and VHF and UHF and microwave) communications in facilities that were real and large, covering the entire globe long before comm sats were aloft. Modern methods were used as well as those that existed before WW2. I am proud of what I did and am thankful that I can share in the heritage of the Signal Corps both during and after my real service. I don't have to pretend my remaining uniform sets are some kind of "costume." When I wore it we were NOT pretending anydamnthing.

You are welcome to take your wigwaging morse code and shove it up your I/O port, sissy civilian.

Incorrect. I was a working illustrator, full time, before voluntarily enlisting in the Army. I was already an art major in high school, instructor being Richard Martikonis, (USNR Lieutenant) for three years.

Since changing major college study to engineering, I've done three contract illustration jobs as part-time employment for fixed amount of contract work and compensation. I'm not counting the art work done for Ham Radio magazine.

"Flit?" In 54 years of working full-time since high school graduation?!?

Is everyone supposed to enter some castle-like seminary and sit out their whole lives producing some single product?

Or do you favor some socialist-extreme existance where you work for a single employer (or the state) until you die?
You are welcome to that sort of rut, comrade.

You don't like CONTRACT work? Too unstable for you? Is that somehow beneath your lofty and superior standards?

The Naval Air Development Center, Warminster, PA, is located outside of the city of Philadelphia. EXACTLY I've been IN Philadelphia and IN Camden, NJ, just across the Delaware River from Philly.

Considering that I was an employee of RCA Corporation
before, during, and after I visited NADC as a field engineer, I was never approached to join them for any employment and neither did I seek to get employment

there. I got along fine with NADC civilian and military personnel there, did my assigned, pre-established work, departed for my home in California.

I've explained all that before. You again choose to attempt to CHANGE it to suit your hostile intent.

Never ever while UNDER the UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY
JUSTICE. That ended 49 years ago for me.

I acknowledged accidentally writing "universal" instead of uniform a few days ago. I did go to UNIVERSAL CITY after writing that to meet with some friends. Since the DD-214 form is applicable to ALL branches of the military
I just made a mistake in associating the word "universal"
with the subject.

In case you've noticed, Lord High Whatever, this newsgroup

There are none so blind as the PCTA who insist that manual morse code testing is "necessary" for a hobby
radio license examination.

There are none so blind as the PCTA who cannot see that morse code is a dying mode in radio communications.

There are none so blind as the PCTA who cannot see that code for communications.

"Rationality" is NOT defined as "being 'for' morse code."

There is NO "vote" concerning NPRM 05-143. That's reality.

The FCC has proposed eliminating ALL code testing for amateur radio license examinations. That's reality.

The FCC has, in the past two years, allowed the public to comment on no less than 18 Petitions regarding code testing. That's reality.

The FCC has NOT seen any "consensus" nor a real "majority"
of opinion for or against morse code testing for an amateur radio license in the comments concerning amateur radio regulation petitions. That's reality.

The FCC isn't a clubhouse manager for U.S. amateur radio to allow ONLY already-licensed radio amateurs to comment
to them. That's reality.

Hardly a "brave act" to slap around some beep-happy old morsemen who are mired in their thinking and unable to accept change.

>Suppose you had been born in 1954, Len.

That would have been an interesting alternate universe

Japan then and had advanced to E-5 rank...and my parents (both naturalized U.S. citizens) were nowhere near Japan at the time. :-)

>Would you have volunteered to fight in Vietnam in 1972?

The Southeast Asia Live Fire Exercise (Vietnam War)
has already been OFFICIALLY designated as being August 4, 1964 to January 27, 1973 (date of ceasefire)
by the U.S. Department of Defense.

Oh, now I understand, would I have volunteered to fight
FOR North Vietnam IN Vietnam in 1972? Most assuredly
NOT. Most unequivocally NOT for the North!

In 1972 I had already been discharged from all military obligations of the United States (my discharge was in 1960) and I had been, and was, working on Department of Defense contracts for electronics. In 1972 some of my work was on the Seismic Intrusion Devices (SIDs)
that were intended to be used in Vietnam. [those used radio to report detected intrusions]

In case it has escaped your movie-conditioned little mind, the United States has had a WORLDWIDE military presence since the end of WW2. One does NOT 'volunteer to fight' anywhere, in any service. One either gets drafted (the compulsory military service "draft" ended 27 January 1973) or volunteers to "defend the Constitution of the United States" and must accept whatever assignment anywhere as deemed necessary by the DoD. Nobody got a "choice of where to fight" unless one was the son of a prominent politician (Shrub) or some entertainment personality (Elvis).

>In other words, you and your neighbors wanted to stop other people >from building certain types of buildings on their own land - because >it would mess up your view.

The only "other people" were contractor firms. Nobody owned
"their own" land yet until the development was finished and inspected and approved by the city.

The neighborhood organization was against the ZONING change from "R" (pure residential) to "R1" (residences plus aparments). The original plan was for "senior citizen apartments" which we neighbors did not like. Yes, a two-story house or apartment would block my VIEW that I enjoyed for over 30 years here.

Perhaps you want me to sit back and take whatever
"authorities" toss at me without complaint? HELL NO!
None of us neighbors did. We showed up at the Zoning Commission meeting and made our voices heard. It was for naught according to a later investigation of graft on the part of the Zoning Commission. That parcel of land got rezoned to R1 over a decade ago and that was that. No action on development until several years later.

Perhaps you weren't really learning the REAL Ben Franklin or even REAL history prior to 1776. Franklin was a royalist to begin with. Took him a VERY long time to actually side with the "revolutionaries." [recorded history, by the way] WE neighbors weren't sheep nor anything like that and protested.

>> after spending 9 months of re-arranging the vacant land.
>How does anyone "rearrange" land? With a bulldozer?

All manner of earth-moving equipment were used to move 220,000 cubic yards of soil (value from contractor final report, initial estimate was 250,000 cubic yards). Actual earth moving took eight months until the final moving was done for drainage, roadway, and forming the final lay of each plot.

Nine months of the OHSA back-up beepers getting us up at 7 AM each working day of the week and some Saturdays.

>44 homes on 15 acres is about a third of an acre each.

WAYYYY INCORRECT. You are assuming flat land. Nowhere near that. Final building plots were on a quarter acre each average.

>Half a million each is a starter home, right?

Subjective.

>So - you thought your "view" was more important than >the newcomers' property rights.

No, our neighborhood organization was against changing the ZONING from pure residential to residences-with-allowed-apartments.

>You thought that those >15 acres should not be developed, even though you >didn't own them.

Our neighborhood organization would accept the original "R" zoning rating of single-family residences. The Zoning Commission heard that. We objected to the "R1" zoning that allowed apartments.

>You resisted changes that brought in new people and more progress.

What "progress?" :-) You have no huckin idea of what the development was/is, its original shape, the shape it is in now, landscaping or anything else. You are trying to toss out nasty sarcastic bad words to us that were here before them. :-)

The SECOND developer managed to develop a walled community that houses about 150 total, nearly all with little bitty yards separated by concrete block walls.

Right now there's a possibility of civil action by two neighbors where the original slope to the edge of the new walled community gave way and inundated their property.
We'll just have to wait for that to sort itself out.
Meanwhile, you will no doubt make nasty remarks to my old neighbors for DARING to PROTEST part of THEIR land from being covered? :-)

>You clung to the past and tried to hold back the future.

I'm sorry, but you just don't grasp this NON-RADIO situation.

ZONING laws, particularly in residential areas, ARE where the past is protected...for those who ALREADY live there.

>And you failed.

Yes, we did. I reported that. :-) That's the breaks in political situations.

>And you FAILED.

Yes. But ONLY for the ZONING change. We were able to enrich the pockets of some Zoning Commission members from payola from the first contractor...which led to him going out of business. :-) The second contractor is not in a good situation either since that company is forced to settle one way or the other.

NO apartments were built, only single-family residences were finally built. That is a partial victory although the Zoning rating still allows for apartments on that land.

>What I find most interesting is that you fought change, progress, >and newcomers. And you thought your views should count for >more than the wants and needs of those who owned the land.

What I find "interesting" is your continued hostility and ignorance of the situation, even when explained to you.
I have well over a hundred images showing the earth-moving and the house building, have a small box of documents that go back 15 or so years on that parcel of land, copies of plans, etc. Our neighborhood organization didn't take anything lightly.

>What spin? What fabrication? What lies?

All that you've tried to "charge." :-)

>I simply point out that you and your neighbors feared and opposed >change in the neighborhood. That's the truth.

OK, I simply point out that you are ignorant of the situation and you are a dump huck.

Tsk, you could have HUNDREDS of DD-214 forms...all blank. Kinko's and other printing services (such as "job printer" independents) can do such work a minimal cost.

So far, none of us have seen "yours" as filled out by authorities.

A DD-214 (filled out by authorities) has always been, and remains, a RELEASE FROM ACTIVE DUTY. It was NEVER a "discharge" document.
Each military branch of the United States has their own discharge from all military service and those are different forms.

A close look at the upper right hand corner will show "Condition of Release" as it pertains to the DD-214. That refers to the RELEASE FROM ACTIVE DUTY. RELEASE, not discharge.

So far, none of us have been able to see what is on "yours."

Here's the drill:

1. Take your (filled out by authorities) DD-214 to a scanner.
If you had later changes to the DD-214, take along your DD-215 form (filled out by authorities) as well.

2. If you have none of "yours" available, go to the NARA website and order a duplicate (they have forms for doing it by surface mail). The cost is minimal, even to one on a disability pension.

3. Make the scanned digital copy file available for inspection by anyone, either posting it to your home page or sending it as an attachment to e-mail directly to those requesting a copy.

Following that simple 3-step process fully will end the endless foul invectives you've hurled at all those challengers in trying to avoid showing the truth for seven years.

Failure to comply will only result in all of us affirming that you are nothing but an Imposter, a scam artist, a con-man, a poseur, an imitator who is casting dishonor on the Corps.

I don't think it matters anymore -- his ignorant blatherings are more than enough evidence to prove that he was never a Devil Dog. And if he should ever produce a DD-214 in the future, I wouldn't be convinced of it's authenticity even if the CMC hand-delivered it to my door.

The game is over. He lost. Only one question remains..... what shall be the disposition of Steve "Yellow Dog" Robeson?

bunk! Your logic is failed because those free upgrades were proposed as a one time only set of upgrades to get people to a newly aligned set of licenses and privileges without subjecting anyone to a lose of privileges.

Prior to 2000, was the Novice too high?
If the FCC went back or changed Tech to a Novice level test (retaining the General and Extra as is) would that bother you?

Yawn.... BUT publishing the questions was never proposed

ARRL is perfectly capable of that I'm sure.

The number of "retreads" is propably a very small percentage of those that appear as new.

Jim,

Lens point is that every serviceman and servicewoman in uniform serves with the understanding that their very life is pledged, at the very real risk of armed conflict, to serve their fellow man, commonly for material rewards less than that enjoyed by an Assistant Shift Manager at your local Burger King.

In the past (and probably in the future) Len and I have found all sorts of reasons to disagree, but on this issue I come down four-square on his side. Comparing that pledge which Len, Brian, and several other here took, to the risks "suffered" by an electric company linemen or a construction worker is mean spirited and unbecoming. I don't much care whether you served in uniform or not (the majority of todays adults chose not to), but I will not quietly tolerate your insulting characterization of military service as somehow on the same order of risk and "nobleness" as a worker who sets up replacement power poles. And please don't add to the insult with your chant about "served in other ways".

Just apologize to all of us, including Len, who served at risk of our very lives so you could enjoy the freedom to imply that our service was on the same order as a bridge painter.

Well the VE teams that I have been on allow the applicant to keep testing on the same element until one of the following things happens:

1. The applicant passes
2. The team runs out of different versions of the test for the element that the applicant trying to pass
3. The applicant runs out of money or patience
4. The VE team runs out of time or patience.

The team is not required to stay just because an applicant wants to keep trying. It is within the team's rights to set the length of the test session and whether or not to extend it.

I have no problem with that since, per your point 2,
the applicant doesn't retest the same version of the test already taken at that VE session.

Apparently there was a "Frank Gilliland" that was employed directly by the DoD..... some sort of 'hush-hush' occupation.

Speaking of similar names, I found the following list of residences for "Steven J. Robeson":

Ravenna, OH
Trumann, AR
Dunlap, TN
Pikeville, TN
Winchester, TN
Cross Junction, VA
Berryville, VA
Huntington, WV
Milton, WV
Atlanta, GA
Duluth, GA
Marietta, GA
Costa Mesa, CA
Irvine, CA
Santa Ana, CA

Funny thing..... all these people with the same name as K4YZ have the same approximate age as K4YZ. What a mind-boggling coincidence!!!

Yep. And that description was included in the part of my DD-214 that I posted. But in a frantic attempt to discredit me he just -presumed-it's meaning because he had never seen a DD-214, and therefore didn't know that 'time in service' is recorded in a section that I didn't scan.

I'm really suprised that the ex-military contingent of Dudly's posse didn't offer him that info..... they seem to help him out with other information when the need arises. What's up with that (as if I didn't already know)?

License examination privatization happed to BOTH the commercial radio operator license exams as well as radio amateurs.

There was no "VEC system" any more than it was a "COLEM system."

There were no "secrets" prior to the "Bash Books" since the essential questions were included in the "Q & A"
books available in the 1950s.

The copyright laws of the United States haven't changed appreciably since 1950 insofar as the federal government has NO copyright on anything it publishes. One example that should be familiar to civilians looking at news stands is J. K. Lassers Income Tax guide books which include copies of all IRS forms.

Those who don't like the amateur radio license examination written questions can communicate with the VEC Question Pool Committee. The VEC QPC makes up ALL the questions for EACH class' written examinations.

That situation is eminently fair to me and should be to all radio amateurs desiring the "clubhouse" kind of "community." :-)

It seems more likely that the longer a complainant has been licensed, the smarter they are, and the newcomers are way dumber than they, the OTs, were. :-)

ARRL's Petition RM-10867. ARRL's Comments filed on 31 October 2005 on NPRM 05-143 is partly a slight rewrite of RM-10867. [Chris is trying very hard to get his handiwork approved? :-)]

ARRL's new "petition" (no RM assignment yet) calls for a revision of the "band plans." That is accessible from their www.arrl.org splash page.

Whatever. :-) First item is excellent. Second, okay.
Does there really need to be an "assessment" as in the third? What "assessments" were done in the past?

Back when I was in, the Army changed the MOS numbering system, then again after I got my discharge. The last change is what the Army uses now and those are found on www.goarmy website. Nomenclature of an occupation specialty is FAR less important than actually KNOWING WHAT TO DO once one has an MOS or whatever job to do.

In the 53 years since I first volunteered for the Army, the state of the art of communications has leapfrogged several plateaus, changing the entire structure of C-four-I into something that would be unrecognizeable to anyone who got out just after WW2.
The term "C-cubed-I" wasn't even coined yet, let alone "C-four."

My last look at a working Signal Center (on the Brigade level) was in 1989, a year before Iraq invaded Kuwait. I've listened to a Hughes Aircraft Co. field engineer explain how it was in the build-up for Desert Storm IN Saudi Arabia, with all the massive amounts of communications flowing to CENTCOM in Florida (!) and Washington DC by satellite relay and by troposcatter relay. Incredible advances from what my old Signal Battalion did for FEC Hq using WW2-era HF communications using tube radio equipment. I got a glimpse of the AN/PSC-5, then a newbie in the inventory for fast, quick messaging from "behind the lines," slated to replace the PSC-3. Secure and able to relay off either satellites or airborne relay aircraft on low UHF, it beat the hell out of those old "romantic" stories of morsemen derring-do in occupied France during WW2. The information thus obtained enabled "73 Easting" to procede in a faster
panzerfaust than ol' Irwin Rommel could ever imagine.

OK. My only prolonged contact with USCG types was a light commander who was liason field officer on RCA's RIHANS test in Galveston, TX. Nice guy, KNEW his communications stuff!
RIHANS = River and Inland Harbor Area Navigation System, an R&D program partly funded by the government and done before NAVSTAR successfully morphed into GPSS. Test was successful to guaranteed +/- 1 yard accuracy anywhere out to 30 miles.

Har, har! :-) The answer is obvious: He does not have any ex-military contingent in his posse because he wasn't there.
I find it incredible that any career type doesn't have a single snapshot or mention of a buddy's name for an alleged 18-year total enlistment...of course, if one didn't actually DO that,
then there would be NO names, NO snapshots.

Think of it as a "posse comedy taught us." :-) [arghhh!]

His corpus is bio-degradable. That's all the suggestion I can offer on "disposition." It might make suitable fertilizer for something...?

Wait...here's a thought...teach him some Arabic, enough to get along...strap on him as much explosive as he can carry, set him loose among some extremist Muslim in the Middle East with orders to go BOOM amongst them. Kind of a small payback for what those extremist numb-nuts have been doing to us and good Muslims for years. "Disposal" neatly solved (parts too small to recover).

Perhaps too Draconian for the lily-livered peacenik sissies in here, though. Cancel that. Might be a waste of good C4 or RDX and hook-up wire.

Sorry, Your Scumminess.

I've provided handfuls of other verifiable references to my military service that you've dissed and pooh-poohed, so this is not happpening.

Interesting choice of adjectives coming from a "guy" who was too

court martialed TWICE.

Yet Burger King managers, newspaper sellers, grocery clerks, etc, get killed every day doing their jobs, often defending those places against an armed foe.

Sorry, Hans...we have to disagree here.

Follow OSHA safety stats there are jobs far more dangerous and less "rewarding", both in pecuniary renumeratioon and job satisfaction, than serving in the Armed Forces.

> Just apologize to all of us, including Len, who served at risk of our very lives
> so you could enjoy the freedom to imply that our service was on the same order > as a bridge painter.

Jim owes no one an apology here, Hans...Not when you consider one of those who DID serve USED the deaths of men who DID die in battle well before he was even out of High School to "polish his brass" in this very same forum.

The fact of the matter is that many men DO face danger far more routinely than the average service man, short of toe-to-toe armed conflict, will face.

I note that Lennie takes great pains to try and "expose" the "myths and mythos" of Amateur Radio and places himslef above "mere mortals" for his enlightenment of it.

Funny coming from a guy who wanted us to know how courageously he "fought"...errrrr..."served" under the threat of the Soviet Bear Tu-95 (not in service when he was), or how others dare not tell HIM what it was like being under incomming artillery fire. (not unless the "Cannon Cockers" on the practice range accidentilly aimed the wrong way...)

The fact of the matter is that cops, firemen, powerline workers, slaughterhouse workers, and a laundry list of others face more imminent danger than we did in the Armed Forces on an average day.

Yes, that oath to "uphold and defend" the Constitution takes on a more direct implication of imminent mortal danger, but the truth of the matter is a serviceman is more likely to get killed in a training acident or get hit by a drunk driver than to be a KIA.

The bottom line is that while we depend on the Armed Forces to keep our borders safe and the "bad guys" at bay, all those other "served in other ways" people are no less integral to creating and maintaining our way of life.

I realize that, Hans, and I honor that pledge and that service. I apologize if anyone was offended. That was not my intent.

But Len tries to make it sound like no one other than military service ever faces any danger in their job.

I did not mean to sound that way. Again, if it sounded that way, I apologize.

There is no such rating in the CG. The Hospital Corpsman (HS) is the only medical-related rating we have.

We don't utilize the DoD's MOS. Our job descriptions are known as "ratings."

Yes, the M-9 pistol, M-16 rifle, and a custom Remington 14-inch, 12 ga shotgun. (Regarding the M-9, we're switching from the 9mm Beretta to a .40 cal Sig.)

Jim, if you felt an "apology" was warranted, then bravo for you.

However if you get into the habit of "apologizing" everytime someone doesn't like your "tone" or how it MIGHT sound, then you just spend your whole life apologizing.

Spending your life with your tail between your legs is no way to live.

Ahhhh.....Working on some of those devices that you claim that others who "served in other ways" didn't do or didn't contribute...

Uh huh...I see.

So....No one that doesn't live on Lanark Street could possibly know about "the situation"...?!?!?

Are you NOW stating that is IS impossible for someone to have a truely INFORMED opinion on something eventhough they are not directly involved in it, Lennie?

Because you've been telling us for years that there's no reason in the world for you to get an Amateur Radio license since even without actually being involved, you "know" what it's like based on second hand observation and third-party tellings...

The contractor/developers owned the land, right? They wanted to develop it in a way you didn't like, so you tried to stop them.

Why not? You're a senior citizen ;-)

So you think your "right" to a VIEW is more important than people having a place to live....

Indeed.

But you want me to sit back and take whatever rules changes "authorities" (like the FCC) toss out without complaint or protest. HELL NO!

The analogy is clear, whether you admit it or not.

> None of us neighbors did.

None of us procodetest folks did either.

Yes - you tried to stop progress and development, and to restrict what others could do on their land. You wanted the neighborhood to stay just as it was, despite the changes in American society. (more senior citizens, more people, etc.)

Did anyone go to jail? Was anyone found guilty of any corruption?

You folks missed a chance. When the first developer went bankrupt, you could have all banded together and bought the land.
Then you'd have been able to control its development. But instead of that free-market, capitalist approach, where you put your money where your view is, you wanted The Government to value your views over those of the people who owned that land.

Let's see - in his time, anyone seen as a traitor to the crown could be executed by being drawn and quartered. Which is more than a little unpleasant, particularly with family and friends made to watch.

What did you neighbors risk in your protest?

OK, that too. Yet those apartments never got built, right?

And what's wrong with residences-with-allowed-apartments?
People live in the apartments, right? They're not dangerous or a nuisance. It's not like they wanted to put a refinery or a chemical plant there.

Why? Because they were 2 story? Because they'd house senior citizens? Because you just don't like change?

Diversity and new forms of housing in your restricted, uptight, NIMBY neighborhood. Why can't you accept a little change?

You sure preach to others about accepting change and not standing in the way of progress when it comes to amateur radio rules - which don't affect you at all because you're not going to become a ham anyway.

> You have no huckin idea of what

You have no huckin idea of what operating Morse Code on the amateur bands was/is, their original shape, the shape
they're in now, the changes that removing the code test will bring, or anything else.

You don't like an "outsider: like me commenting on "your"
neighborhood, but you demand that everyone accept your comments on a "neighborhood" (the ham bands)
where you're a complete outsider.

It's not ignorance or hostility. It's an alternate view of things. You don't like alternate views.

Very "mind-boggling" indeed, since not even half of those are

But then only "half the story" seems to be Frankie's forte. So go

He's a citzen.

There's not a whole lot "senior" about him.

And "forcing" Lennie to live near other's his age would be like "forcing" him to get an Amateur Radio license...It might "force" him to realize that he is not the Alpha and Omega of his realm.

So...We get them to raise a privacy wall around the new buildings and let the mural artists go to work...Then Lennie can have whatever "view", however myopic, he wants. Maybe one with no antennas and no faces over 40?

Assessment, review, whatever. I personally think the current 3 level license structure does not reflect a good starting path for new hams because Techs are
(a) only allowed VHF, yet they have (b) power privileges for full 1500 watts. My personal view is to have a beginners license with a variety of HF and VHF access and modes but with a limited power output (say 200 watts or less).

The current 3 licenses and privileges are the result of piecepart change over time and the result has
some less than logical consequences regarding privileges and entrance level testing when compared to the Novice tests which we had for almost 50 years. YMMV.

Cheers,

You should be able to assimilate yourself quite well with the likes of
"2Test" AB8MQ and some of his brother jammers and malcontents.
Does the below look familiar, Mr. Bailey????

We, at the LPWS have often been accused of being jammers, but this is far from the truth. Admittedly, there is the playing of music on repeaters, but these are usually idle until one of our members comes along with a jolly tune (see the selection for download!).
An analogy of what occurs could be the following:- You stand on a river bridge calmly throwing stones into the water, a few anglers a mile or so away hear this and pack up and walk down to the area of the river beneath the bridge and set up their rods. They then complain that you are disturbing the fish!

Jim owed one, and gave one. I'd firmly shake his hand and say "thanks" in person.

I don't know WTF is "brass polishing", but suffice to say this. I'm a first-generation American. I don't have any ancestors who fought at Yorktown or Bunker Hill or Gettysburg or Tripoli or Alamo or San Juan Hill. But I consider every American patriot who ever wore the uniform of these United States, all the way back to the irregulars at Bunker Hill, to be my shipmate/comrade in arms. Likewise the sailor/soldiers/airmen/marines who serve today and in the future. If that association is "brass polishing", then so be it.

If you say so, Steve. On Memorial Day, make a generous donation to the "American

HOLIDAY GREETINGS FROM K1MAN

And Jesus said:

"...The sower went forth to sow....." Many seeds did not take root. "...and other(s) (seeds) fell upon the good ground and yielded fruit.."

So we, as Radio Amateurs, sow our seeds of national and international good will and friendship. There is a lot of good ground out there and much rocky soil as well.

Best wishes to all, both friends and enemies, during this 2005 holiday season.

Poor Commode, another lame response as usual, but he does hide beind a cheezy cancelled 1950's sci-fi character whose show had shitty special effects. Maybe that's why the Commode always talks about port-a-potties. He always is on the losing side.

K1MAN ESSAY - ES051202 -

Blood is Thicker Than Water

America is all of us. If you come from another country and/or another culture, you are welcome by me as we offer you citizenship and the protections of our precious Constitution. Those of us who were born here, however, are willing, by definition, to die in the protection of our precious birth land and our precious Constitution.

Even though America is all of us, and it is, we will not allow you to do some quite important things such as being our President if you were not born here. There is a damn good reason for this. If push comes to shove, we are afraid you might "cut and run." I say "might." We simply don't want to take this chance, however slight it may be.

In that sense, therefore, those who are not born in America are "second class" Americans.

Same deal in Maine. If you were not born in Maine, you are not a Mainer. I "deal" with that. Mainers do cut me SOME slack, however, since I have been a citizen of Maine for 48 years. SOME slack, not very much. That is just how it is, blood is thicker than water.

America is predominantly Christian, and we do, indeed, have a national Christmas tree. That is just how it is, blood is thicker than water. In this case, we are remembering the holy birth of Jesus and the blood many of us believe he shed for all of us. That is just how it is, blood is thicker than water.

English is the predominant language in America. Some day there well might be more Spanish speaking Americans born here than English speaking Americans born here. There might well be more "African Americans" born here that "whites" born here. Hey man, this is America; I just love being American!

When the first human, an American, set foot on the moon, a Russian said to an American:

"It must be great to be an American tonight!"

No, "Ivan:"

"It is great to be an American EVERY night!"

That is just how it is, blood is thicker than water.

If America is threatened or if our Constitution is threatened, you had better watch out! I will STAND UP and fight, and if I need help, I will choose a "kid" born in America, educated in America, who played sports in America, and who was trained by the U.S Marines, U.S Army, U.S. Navy, U.S Air Force, the U.S. Military Academy, our Air Force Academy, Annapolis, etc., etc., over someone else who might just "cut and run" when push comes to shove, as happened in WWII and countless other situations that have cropped up over our brief 200 year history.

If your native country got "raped" during WWII, YOU are the ones who that let it happen, and those kids mentioned above are the ones who came over to "bail out" your collective asses. The "goose step" did not frighten those kids very much. Americans don't know the total humiliation of being "raped." We have NO FEAR of someone coming in the middle of the night to take one of us away. Our Constitution specifically allows us to have guns for just such an occasion if such ever occurred, however unlikely. Many Americans have more "fire power" than the so called "professionals." That is just how it is, blood is thicker than water. Be careful! Don't count America out yet! That is just how it is, blood is thicker than water.

May God bless you and your family during this holy season.

73 and GL de K1MAN

Well I would propose dropping the Tech altogether and upping the General written to 50 question test once the code is dropped. The difference in technical material is not great and it's not that hard to memorize the difference in privileges.

Once the code is dropped, in the classes that I teach, I will combine the material and encourage all the students to go straight to General. There really won't be a need for an introductory license.

I'm not convinced that a "starting path" is necessary.

Firstly, having grades or levels of license is too
much like the traditional union concept of work with levels of apprentice-journeyman-master. Amateur radio isn't a union nor a guild nor a craft. Differing levels/classes of license only reinforce the already-
present class-distinction social divisions in U.S.
amateur radio. It is a HOBBY, a recreational pursuit done for enjoyment of radio, not on achieving some artifice of social standing. Plenty of other organizations exist for social climbers looking for status and title.

Operating a radio transmitter is, in reality, not a complex task nor is "amateur radio operation" some kind of mystical event, requiring perfect
incantations to have some magic occur. Unlicensed

(in radio) public safety people routinely do that. Unlicensed (in radio) aircraft crew routinely do that. Unlicensed (in radio) business people routinely do that. Dozens of other examples are available where unlicensed-in-radio individuals routinely operate radio transmitters without some long "training" period of months or years in order to be "proper" operators in radio. I see absolutely no reason for amateur radio people engaging in a hobby to do that sort of thing...except to salve the egos of the long-"tenured" "senior" amateurs.

>The current 3 licenses and privileges are the >result of piecepart change over time and the result has
>some less than logical consequences regarding

>years. YMMV.

My odometer reads the same as yours on regulations' evolution of continuing piece-part changing. That is a consequence of radio politics, and NOT, in my view, of any "necessity" to have a layered system of classes for a hobby. EM-space doesn't recognize "classes" OR human politics; electrons, fields, and waves are all unaffected by human regulations or emotion or "needs" to stratify standing within some "fellowship."

The Novice class license is a failure in the long run. While it might have been a good idea at the beginning for some to "get their feet wet" (in radio waters), it started off badly with the emotional baggage of its class title, "Novice." As viewed from afar, it served only to initiate the completely ferklempt with "proper" radiotelegraphy procedure and with the "proper" jargon (which had evolved in the particular activity of amateur radio)...not to mention having the "proper attitude" of worship and respect of "elders" (who thought they "ran" things). That can work on typical teen-agers who have yet to experience more of life and the variety of humans who exist in the real world. It does not work well with adults.

Longevity of a regulation such as "novice" or "beginner" or "entrant" in a field such as radio and communications that has constantly been evolving over the last half-century is not a logical necessity to keep those regulations. Time has shown that the newcomers have shunned the Novice class for decades;

its class numbers are continuously decreasing.

Concentration on getting young newcomers into a hobby field seems driven more by some basic paternal drive to "guide and educate the kids." Perhaps its a by-product of parenthood or a surrogate for that? It is misplaced in a "community" whose active members are predominently adult. Children don't have the monetary base to build market sales which serve to benefit the adults. Children don't have the experience to run events or keep organizations (predominently adult) together. At best, the drive to "get youngsters interested" in a primarly-adult hobby seems to be little more than eyewash, using politically-correct psycho phrases.

On the other hand, targeting an entrance drive for amateur radio to teenagers will tend to steer them away from their contemporaries' activities...those activities having evolved to fit that peer group and not necessarily that of adults. It will serve to show those beginners that there is an unknown facet of the adult world ahead. It can also serve to alienate them from their own peer group by making them "different." That is a not-good thing among teen-agers who seek the stability of "their" group, a natural psychological need in that part of their life.

My own experience on "entering HF" were rather drastic in "apprenticeship" consisting only of a few days (at most). So were the 4 newcomers with me, none of us having been schooled on high-power HF transmitters. We were shown how to do it by more senior signalmen and we did it. Those that did it wrong were shown why and had to practice getting it right. No re-criminations leveled, no "chewings out," no ostracizing. We all learned and did our tasks (some of which were considerably more complicated than any found in amateur radio operating). So did those that came before us and those that came after us.

I can draw a parallel to the activities of infantry, armor, and artillery soldiers who had to learn how to operate radios necessary for military communications. They did it by the thousands upon thousands of soldiers, nearly all of them inexperienced in using any radio other than a broadcast receiver before their service. Those that say "they only push the button and talk" are doing them an extreme disservice since there is considerably more to do than that. Radio training for line outfits is abbreviated to, at most, a couple weeks with most of that being branch-specific procedural matters. Now,

if they can all do that successfully in a short time,
it makes no logical sense to have class stratification
of being held in one class for a year or more.

As another "first-generation American," I salute you proudly.

My parents came to the USA of their own volition and became naturalized citizens of the USA. They both earned their citizenship.

Dudly the [Marine] Imposter seeks to discredit my military service by reference to 23 soldiers of my battalion who died in the period of 1950 to 1963. I honor those men still, even after standing many a Retreat ceremony at sundown in their memory. I have all their names, service numbers, their home towns. Hardy Barracks, about the only military location still existant in Tokyo today was named after Corporal Elmer Hardy, in the first group of 19 who perished on 1 July 1950. Camp Tomlinson, the transmitter site NE of Tokyo, was named for another signalman who perished that same day...that name remained in use by the USAF when they had command of the facilities from 1963 until 1978.

Now, I have to admit that I have an advantage in knowing the "geneaology" of my military unit. I had one. Not only that, I know when it was formed (1945), where it was when I was in it, where it was and what it was named afterward, even to what became of it, enduring today as the 78th Signal Battalion at Camp Zama, Japan, and a part of USARPAC. The callsign of USARPAC Hq today is ADA, the same as the station that my battalion ran in the 1950s in Tokyo. Worse yet, I've been in contact with individuals who served in my battalion even including a civilian who worked for the Army at the transmitter site. One of those individuals is Gene Rosenbaum, N2JTV, who was there at the same time I was.

Dudly hasn't mentioned a single individual in any of his claimed "outfits", made available ANY photo or snapshot of himself taken during his alleged 18-year career, nor made available to anyone a single one of his claimed "many" DD-214s, has made MANY actual errors of official and un-official names and procedures used by the Marines, has verified NOTHING of his heroic-warrior military service, all in seven years of unremitting vile insults at anyone daring to challenge his opinion on anything.

>If you say so, Steve. On Memorial Day, make a generous donation to the "American >Bridge-Painters-Who-Fell-Off-Their-Scaffold Orphans Fund"

By all means, Dudly, STAY AWAY from any REAL Memorial group on Memorial Day or Veterans Day...if you wish to preserve your wretched little life of lies and deception and dishonor of the United States Marine Corps.

I don't think it's "bunk" at all. Neither does FCC.

Here's why:

ARRL proposed that Technicians and Tech Pluses get a free upgrade to General without taking any tests.

Any such action by FCC would need an effective date - a date when the rules would change, and the free upgrade would take effect.

A new amateur who earned the Technician the day before the effective date would get the free upgrade, just like all other Techs. The result would be that Generals who hadn't taken the General test would outnumber Generals who had taken the General test.

Worse, new hams who were licensed after the effective date would still have to pass the General exam.

IOW, if the effective date were February 1, a Tech first licensed on January 31
would be a General on February 2, yet have only taken the Tech test.
But a new ham licensed on Feb 2 would have to take the General test for the same privileges. IOW, new hams would have to pass more and harder tests for the
same privileges that others got for free.

Or to put it plainly:

If the General test isn't needed for those who got the free upgrade, why is it needed at all?

But somebody has to pay for it. And you can bet that whatever

But those changes have an enormous impact on the numbers.
That's the point, whether we care about it or not.

Len,

I'm not going to drawn into you and Franks "Steve wasn't a Marine" game.

With the exception of you naming one or two comrades and Frank posting a URL of a scan of a DD214, I don't know of a single veteran here who has named "a single individual", made available any photo, or verified in any way their military service. Applying the same tests that you list above about Steve, means that Dan, Brian, I, Jeff, and any other veterans here that I've not named, are also imposters?

You are ALREADY IN IT, like it or no.

It is NOT a "game." Such an impersonation of being military is punishable and heaps disgrace on the service affected.

>With the exception of you naming one or two comrades and Frank posting a URL of >a scan of a DD214, I don't know of a single veteran here who has named "a single >individual", made available any photo, or verified in any way their military

1. There are not many veterans of the military in HERE.

2. There is a plethora of examples of many, many evidenciaries available on the many, many websites of military veterans
all over the web.

3. "By their words ye shall know them" is a famous phrase and that applies to ANYONE in here. We can all recognize when some wannabe sounds suspicious if not being an outright bullshitting liar.

4. Dudly is a class-A sumbitch with oak leaf clusters and has been one for seven years in here. He has document NONE visible to any of us HERE.

>Applying the same tests that you list above about Steve, means that >Dan, Brian, I, Jeff, and any other veterans here that I've not named, are also >imposters?

Sorry, super chief, I'm not falling for that circular "touring" test. Logic that ain't, queer it is. A "colossus" of ill logic. *

Dudly says he is NOT going to comply with anything. His con-man feelings are hurt, the poor boy. Boo-hoo.

You want a 10 MB PDF all about the battalion and my station assignment in Japan while I was in the service? I've given it in here often enough. It is a good photo essay. Got pictures of me and buddies in there as well.

You want to see an article in the Pacific Stars & Stripes that was an interview of me by Rick Chernitzer about Hardy Barracks? I've given that in here as well. Some of the 600+ photos I took while over there were published in the Stars & Stripes.

I've digitized a number of documents I have about my military and civlian service. In trying to send out some of them, all I get is waaa-waaa static from the Extras who "refuse to look at it." One sissy bitched that one had "male nudity" in it! [it is impossible to tell gender from a "moon shot" at a distance...the gender was assumed, sir, just ASSumed] I can send any of them as attachments to private e-mail or I can ask someone else to put them on their larger website (an imposition on them which requires I return a favor and so is a fall-back position) Tsk, tsk, I've gotten a basket full of "complaints" from Dud about my work RESUME being a "curiculum vitae"...which it wasn't.

I've given FOUR names in this newsgroup who can vouch for what I've said. Three of those are Amateur Extra class amateur radio licensees, the fourth is a retired DoD civilian engineer.

Now it would be neat, tidy, and convenient if one could just "call the VA" and the VA will verify something on anyone's personnel record in the military? NOT SO. If one is not an authorized human resources worker (personnel office), authorized government agency, or family member of the individual, the information returned is ZERO. Nil. Nada. Nyet. The VA will contact NARA to get that but the requestor must furnish their SS number as well as the SS number of the query individual AND a service number if that existed for that individual. Dudly hopped up and down on his "reference" of "just call the VA!"

Now, what does that have to do with amateur radio? Plenty when it comes to be TRUTHFUL in here. Anyone LYING on the military service is bound to LIE about their civilian life as well. I've had to take Dud LYING about having a "witness" to my "applying for a job at the former NADC and being rejected," the only true part being that I was at NADC as a field engineer for RCA Corporation in flight testing a collision avoidance system. LYING about anything can be directly related to LYING about anything else.

Getting into finer detail, both Frank Gilliland and I are NOT licensed in the U.S. amateur radio service...yet we get all this static from the regulars in here who are Extras. Of course the regulars aren't that many but one spends an inordinate amount of time on the 'net when he could be playing with his radios.

There's a lesson in that, perhaps. Mainly that unlicensed (as amateurs) should shut up and not say anything against these mighty extra super-pooper hams? Yes, most definitely that's the appearance. We "aren't involved" [with amateur radio] therefore we are to keep silent. Now, if that is the attitude of you supreme beings in charge of it all, howinhell do you think that looks to anyone who might be interested in getting a license? Negative PR, super chief. Negative, negative.

Let's all applaud the former darling of the PCTA in here, Val Germman...still a Tech, MAYBE working on his code (but unlikely after three years). Clap clap. [clap trap]
PCTA couldn't praise Val enough, PCTA couldn't berate the others that didn't like morse enough.

Connections. Not just a PBS TV series with James Burke. No need to invent artifical "connections" to "tests" as you tried to do.

Dudly is guilty until proven innocent. He got himself into that, he can get itself out of it...but it's too late. After seven years of crudibility, there's no way in hell he can recoup any credibility now. Except maybe gratuitous "praise" from Amateur Extras who will laud him to the skies...he IS a "brother" ham, isn't he? "Representative" of "what is good" in amateur radio?

With utmost regards and a hearty "good luck now,"

I don't recall stating (or even implying) that any of those residences were "past-valid". In fact, I didn't even suggest that -any- of them were valid. Quite the contrary: the implication was that many, if not most, of those residences are fraudulent. For example, you used a PO box from Dunlap (the same address you used for your currently lapsed Georgia license) to apply for an EMT license in Tennessee but were refused, but got your TN LPN license using your Winchester address. Now I'm no LEO but that looks pretty shady to me!

Since my discharge I've met many other Marines and I've met many fakers. Casual discussion of their MOS, or even of their service as a Marine, is usually enough for me to tell if someone is either telling

Run? Oh, I don't think so. I normally drive or telephone when filing a complaint about you, Roger. I bring documentation. That's one of the reasons that you have to hide your identity and pretend to be Roger Wiseman's imaginary friend. That's what your pathetic existence comes

The FCC never considered it a long term lowering of requirements on any permananent basis. That is YOUR conclusion only.

That is NOT the reason the FCC rejected the idea. The FCC seems much more aligned with the idea of minimum changes

for now and a wait and see attitude. (IMHO)

Again, none of your argument presented here was a part of the FCC commentary. You may believe it is so, but the FCC never stated it as so.

Or to put it plainly:

> If the General test isn't needed for those who got the free

Please point out wwhere the FCC said that.

> > Free upgrades would effectively lower the requirements.

(a) lower privileges for all existing techs or (b) ??

So the reality is that no one in the ham community pushed that.
I'll conclude then that anytime the FCC proposes a change even if not originated in the ham community, if you view it as a lowering of requirements then it is automatically bad per your opinion.

WHY must there be a waiting period? If applicant X passes a different test at the same VE session, the applicant has still passed the test. If the applicant had taken the one he nowed passed after failing a different one first then the applicant passed...PERIOD. You seem to want a punitive element attached to failing such that the applicant is prohibited from retesting for 'N' period of time. There is NO rhyme or reason to why you want that.

ARRL has more than enough ability to fund such a study or simply assign the task to one of the permanent ARRL staffers.

WHO cares? There is always someone that will take issue with any study conclusion, analysis, ets. If you expect a 100% agreed to set of review and analysis as the end result, tyhen yu're expecting the impossible.

Given the analysis I've seen before presented in QST on various subjects, especially as to ham population and, indirectly ARRL membership, I'll bet the ARRL is always looking at ham and new ham numbers.

The percent of people that might ultimately wait for "possible" (emphasis on possible as opposed to actual) future changes is, I suspect small. Odds are that there aren't many current techs waiting for future free upgrades nor where there likly many that shelved their upgrade plans when the ARRL first proposed free upgrades. (IMHO of course).

Sounds reasonable to me. My ultimate view/perspective...
we need a tiered license structure that makes sense.

> Once the code is dropped, in the classes that I teach, I will combine the > material and encourage all the students to go straight to General. There > really won't be a need for an introductory license.

But they'll still need to approach the testing on a two element basis.

My question to you... should there be a true introductory license to bring new hams, especially youth, to ham radio along the lines of the previous Novice. THE only reason (IMHO) that Novice ceased to be the entry level exam was because Novice didn't get folks the majority of repeater operation which is now a mainstay of ham radio.

Back in the 50s and 60s (until '68 anyway) we really only had 3 licenses: Novice, Tech and General with the ONLY difference between Tech and General being 13 wpm vs 5 wpm...and that was until 1987.

Cheers,
Bill K2UNK

Dump the >>and<< and substitute >>or<< and you might be correct.

An E3 Airman with 2 years service supporting a spouse and 2 children serving here at Davis-Montham AB earns a yearly income of $29,048.40 (that includes housing allowance). At those wages the servicemember would be eligible for food stamps and other public assistance in 39 states.

Based on an Airmans average work week of 61.7 hours (normal tasks plus "military duty" periods) that works out to $9.05/hr. Taco Bell is hiring persons of questionable citizenship off the Tucson streets for $10.75/hr with a raise to $11.35 after one month of "service".

There's a problem with that excuse, Dud, since your LPN license has you listed for a different address (obviously you didn't bother to check the link):

===============
ROBESON , STEVEN JAMES
151 12TH AVENUE NW
WINCHESTER, TN 37398

Profession: Licensed Practical Nurse
Rank: Lic Prac Nurse
License Number: 49513
Status: Active Multistate

Expiration Date: 09/30/2007
===============

So are you now going to suggest that the computer accidently re-routed your LPN renewal to the wrong category -AND- accidently substituted a different address -AND- denied the non-existant application (an application for a license in an occupational specialty that you publically brag about) -AND- kept the rejected application status beyond the 5 year record-keeping limitation of the database?

Please, PLEASE tell me that's what you think happened!!!!

> I've never held an EMT card in TN and never applied for one.

The -facts- tell a different story. The -fact- is that you don't hold an EMT card in -any- state. You are just as much a Marine-imposter as you are an EMT-imposter.

A behavioral pattern is apparent here, Dud. There are many parallels to both 'careers': You fail to reach your goal so you settle for less, then you lie and tell everyone that you -did- reach your goal. For example, you couldn't be a Marine so you joined the NG, then lied and told people that you were a Marine anyway. Another example: You can't get your EMT license so you settle for being an LPN and troll the roads with a scanner and emergency lights, then lie and tell people that you are an EMT. Same type of delusional behavior.

And this same behavior is evident in your newsgroup postings, where you continue your barrage of grade-school rhetoric; which, of course, would be totally unnecessary if you -really had- "bloodied my nose".

Looks like the only goal you -have- accomplished was getting your amateur license!

> Now, your point?

So did you use those bogus addresses for credit applications, too? I think a bankruptcy search might turn up some interesting results.....

781. K1MAN Says ARRL Response To His W1AW Information Demand Not Satisfactory

DAVE SUMNER, K1ZZ, CEO OF ARRL, RESPONDS TO K1MAN's LETTER

December 2, 2005

Glenn A. Baxter
Long Point Lodge
Belgrade Lakes, Maine 04918

Dear Mr. Baxter:

This is in response to your email of December 1, 2005 inquiring about W1AW operating practices.

W1AW is unique in that it is the only station that operates in accordance with the provisions of 97.113(d) of the FCC rules. The rules require that the station schedule operations on at least six MF and HF amateur bands using reasonable measures to maximize coverage, and that a schedule of operating times be published at least 30 days in advance.

As W1AW trustee it is my policy that W1AW adhere to the FCC rules. The station operates in accordance with the published schedule. The W1AW trustee and control operators also take seriously our obligation under 97.101(b) to cooperate in selecting transmitting channels and in making the most effective use of amateur service frequencies. For example, we transmit two brief warning messages prior to the commencement of a scheduled transmission as a courtesy to operators who may be engaged in communications on the scheduled frequencies (Ed. comment: This practice was FIRST used by K1MAN), and we deliberately keep our voice bulletin transmissions brief and limited in number.

Sincerely,

(signed)
David Sumner, K1ZZ
Trustee, W1AW

K1MAN editorial comment:

In other words, 97.113(d) of the FCC rules allows W1AW to pay a control operator for a 40 hour work week (pecuniary interest) for doing exactly what K1MAN does without any pay whatsoever, and doing it infinitely better, thus drawing a $21,000 "fine." W1AW "dumps" on existing QSO's every day and K1MAN only when some moron like K3VR parks there on frequency in order to be "dumped" on, a criminal violation by K3VR of the Goldwater Law. Sumner was a law school drop out and Hollingsworth was sick on the day they taught law at law school. Sumner's letter is a "get out of jail free" card for K1MAN, and Dave will certainly be called as a witess in court along with Hollingsworth. Both men are in alleged criminal violation of the Goldwater Law as well by failing to discourage interference with K1MAN amateur information bulletins:

It is an interesting snub that K1ZZ does not use the call K1MAN in his arrogant middle manager mental midget letter, Hi. Eat your heart out Dave, AARA, the American Amateur Radio Association, has more class than ARRL, the "national association for amateur radio." By the way, exactly what is a "radio relay league" anyway?

Dave,

What is W1AW's current policy with regard to its bulletins, and can you refer me to the ARRL Board minute which established this policy? Specifically, does W1AW listen and/or QRZ each published scheduled frequency before transmitting? If the frequency is busy, does W1AW QSY, delay, or even terminate the scheduled bulletin?

The policy published in QST that I have found is to stick to the published schedule regardless of whether the frequency is busy or not, just as is the policy of K1MAN for information bulletins, which is also consistent with many years of W1AW operating practice as well.

You will remember that K1MAN was "fined" in 1990 with regard to this policy, and my appeal of these "fines" to the full Commission was "deep sized" and thus blocking my further appeals to the D.C. Court of Appeals and the United Stated Supreme Court. Also, these "fines" were never litigated in Federal District Court here in Maine, and my subsequent civil suit to resolve this matter in Federal District Court against the FCC was dismissed. My related civil suit in Federal District Court against ARRL was also dismissed. My many attempts to resolve this matter have thus been repeatedly thwarted. K1MAN was then "fined" again regarding this same policy in April of 2005, a full fifteen years after the original FCC action, thus creating a further legal nightmare for the Commission, of course.

I am a member of ARRL. Thank you for your attention to this request.

Best personal regards. 73.

Needs a top-down review, starting with "basis and purpose." Don't build in merit badge-like license classes to make certain segments of society feel good. Three license classes would probably be one more than needed.

Agreed. Just like when I got my Tech+ (called Tech with HF then) in 1992.
I had to take all the elements involved (i.e. code and two writtens) but I went straight to the Tech+ and never held a Novice.

For now, people will still have to take two writtens to get to General after the code is dropped but I can see the possibility of an eventual two license system (General and Extra).

No I don't think an introductory license is needed anymore. The material for the General written is well within the grasp of young people to learn and comprehend. It's really no more difficult than what they are supposed to be learning in school. It is merely different.

Going straight to General will result in the candidate having a wide range of privileges available at both VHFand up and at HF and down. This will be more meaningful and (in my opinion) more successful than some scaled down introductory license.

Frank, I found the same list via military.com. The thing about that is it is all voluntary information provided by whoever got on www.military.com and joined. Anyone could have done multiple "joinings" with different "home towns." [there IS precedent for that in amateur radio with one Michael Deignan and his FCC mailing address for KH6HZ once being in Hawaii...apparently living in a post office box (rather crowded and stuffy)...we all went over that about five years or so ago in here]

www.search.com is linked to military.com and, by paying extra money, can get (supposedly) "DoD Records." Whether or not those are official government sources is not apparent, but the format looks ever so much "real." :-) Dud isn't worth spending any pennies on so I didn't bother with that.

In his imagination. After all these years Dud isn't able to provide anything visible to the public. Conclusion: He doesn't have any; he is a fake.

The question should be "does he have any friends?" :-)

If Dud wants to be believed, all he has to do is make a document visible to the public. He hasn't done that yet. Conclusion:
He LIES about military service.

If he LIES about military service, he can LIE about civilian service...just as he is NOT qualified as an EMT in Tennessee.
It's just a small step from that to LYING about amateur radio activity or anything else.

The extended search (beyond the DoD records) is through ussearch.com and is a basic name search of public records from all over the country. The list I provided only included hits that had the same name and age as Dudly and had duplicate entries. The list isn't definitive, but it does has a pretty narrow margin of error since 'Robeson' isn't a very common name.

BTW, I doubt that Dudly is the the SJR's in VA and WV, or maybe one or two in CA. But I'm fairly confident that the rest are him because they all correspond to locations where he has resided -- including his home state of Ohio. And as frequently as he moves around, I'd be willing to bet that he has a couple more residences that weren't even listed, perhaps by using his middle name as his first (i.e, James Robeson, a common practice by crooks to create false identities). The search for the truth continues......

Agreed, Bill. The Technician privs are, IMHO,
not optimum for an entry-level license.

Makes sense to me.

The alternative would be to eliminate all license classes except the Amateur Extra, and require all new hams to meet all the requirements of the Amateur Extra without any intermediate steps. While some can and would do so, it's clearly not the best way to do things.

> Firstly, having grades or levels of license is too
> much like the traditional union concept of work with
> levels of apprentice-journeyman-master.

Not really. If a person can meet the requirements of the higher class licenses, they can go right to General or Extra. The apprentice-journeyman system doesn't allow that, except perhaps in extraordinary circumstances.

Every month, a few dozen new licenses are issued to Generals and Extras. While that number is small compared to those who start out as Technicians, it proves that at least some new hams bypass one or both upgrading steps.

> Amateur radio
> isn't a union nor a guild nor a craft.

Len, you're the only one who makes that comparison. Even if it's valid, it means nothing in terms of how many Amateur Radio license classes should exist.

> Differing
> levels/classes of license only reinforce the already-
> present class-distinction social divisions in U.S.
> amateur radio.

Not really. The license classes exist for two reasons:

1) To offer an easy way to get started in amateur radio

2) To offer an easier path to full privileges than would exist with a single license class that required the same knowledge

Anyone who can meet the requirements of the various license classes can earn them. There's no age requirement, no educational requirement other than ability to pass the test, no income requirement other than ability to pay the testing fees (which is sometimes waived by the VEs).

In almost every human activity there are levels of achievement and recognition for same. Radio is no different in that respect than, say, golf, Scrabble,
model airplanes, or almost anything else.

> Operating a radio transmitter is, in reality, not a > complex task

That depends on the transmitter. Some require a lot of skill and knowledge, others do not. And there is far more to amateur radio operation than "operating
a transmitter".

> nor is "amateur radio operation" some
> kind of mystical event, requiring perfect
> incantations to have some magic occur.

No magical incantations, although K0HB's idea of sacrificing a goat in the antenna farm may have some merit ;-)

But many forms of amateur radio operation do
require unique, specialized skills and
knowledge that most nonamateurs have not developed.

Perhaps this skill and knowledge requirement is why
you have such a dislike of Morse Code, Len. Morse Code operation in amateur radio usually involves skilled operators.

> Unlicensed
> (in radio) public safety people routinely do that.
> Unlicensed (in radio) aircraft crew routinely do that.
> Unlicensed (in radio) business people routinely do

> unlicensed-in-radio individuals routinely operate

> period of months or years in order to be "proper"
> operators in radio.

Except that's not the whole story.

The people you cite do not "operate radio transmitters"
in the same sense that radio amateurs do. They are, in reality, radio users, not operators in the sense of amateur radio operators. They are not required to have much if any technical knowledge of their
radio equipment, nor does that equipment have any technical adjustments. In fact the radios are usually set up so that the only adjustments are on-off-volume, channel select, and maybe squelch. In many cases the latter two do not exist.

That they do not require radio operator licenses is proof of
that difference.

Nor do those radio users have much if any technical responsibility for the radios they use. That responsibility is carried by technical people who install, test and maintain the radios.
Of course the person who uses the radio may sometimes also be the technical person, but that is not a requirement
of use.

On top of all that, the radio users cited above may not be FCC licensed, but they are trained, tested and often certified in proper radio procedures for the radios they use. For example, licenses to pilot aircraft with radios require that
the licensee know and demonstrate proper aircraft radio procedures. The pilot's license cannot be obtained without such radio procedure knowledge.

Amateur radio is completely different. A radio amateur is, by definition and regulation, both operationally and technically responsible for his/her station. In the vast majority of situations, the radio amateur sets up his/her station
and operates it without special formal training, testing or certification other than the amateur radio license. So the license tests must be more comprehensive than those for
services where the "operator" is really more of a user.

Typical amateur radio equipment - particularly HF/MF
equipment - has many technical adjustments and controls.
Skill and knowledge are required to operate such radios
to best advantage.

Amateurs are also authorized to design, build, repair, and modify their equipment without any formal certification or type-acceptance requirements other than the spurious-emission rules in Part 97. Most other radio services do not have anything like that sort of freedom.

Unlike almost all other radio services, amateur radio is not formally channelized, particularly on HF/MF. And
unlike almost all other radio services, different modes
of transmission coexist on the same frequency bands.
For example, just between 7000 and 7300 kHz, one can
find amateurs using Morse Code, PSK31, RTTY, SSB, AM, PACTOR, MFSK, SSTV, and a bunch of other modes,
without formal channelization and with only a few FCC
rules and voluntary bandplans to sort things out. Other radio services are much more regimented, regulated, and ordered so as to eliminate the need for user skill and knowledge.

> I see absolutely no reason for

To do what sort of thing - have multiple license classes?

Yet FCC says they think the 3 level system is the optimum
one. That's not just my opinion - it's clearly stated in the NPRM.

Would you prefer the chaos of unregulation? Or perhaps much more regulation that would eliminate much of the freedom and flexibility radio amateurs enjoy?

> The Novice class license is a failure in the long > run.

For most of its history it was a great success in its original purpose, which was to ease the path into amateur radio. It was perhaps the best idea to come out of the restructuring of 1951.

If any license has been a failure at its original purpose, it is the Technician. That license was created to encourage the development and use of VHF/UHF after WW2, and not to be an entry-level license at all.
The original Technician license privileges were for 220 MHz and up. The license was intended for technically-oriented folks who wanted to tinker and build and experiment, and occasionally operate. Yet most Technicians then and now are primarily communicators, not builder/experimenters.

Only to someone like you, who attach such emotional baggage. "Novice" simply means "beginner" and is an accurate name for a license class aimed at beginners.

Perhaps that emotional baggage is why you never held a Novice license, Len. Perhaps you disliked being known as a beginner.

That's just nonsense, Len.

After WW1 and before 1951, the only way to get started in US amateur radio was to pass the Morse Code tests at 10 or 13 wpm (depending on whether the license was earned before or after 1936) and to pass the Class B/C written exam of about 50 questions that included essays, diagrams
and many other areas of knowledge. While people as young as 9 years old managed to do that and earn the licenses, it was a big investment of resources just to get started.

The Novice offered an easier entry point, with slower Morse
Code testing and a much simpler written exam - and much less privileges. The idea was that it would be easier and better for new hams to learn-by-doing.

But there was no requirement to start with a Novice. Anyone who wanted to be a ham could start out with a Technician, General or Conditional, same as the old Class B and C
licenses they replaced.

> That can work on typical teen-agers who have yet to

Yet many adults started out as Novices.

Neither is it a reason to discard the concept. The details may need changing but the concept is valid. It offers a way for newcomers to get started in amateur radio without having to make a large investment of resources.

> Time has shown that the > newcomers have shunned the Novice class for decades;
> its class numbers are continuously decreasing.

No new Novices have been issued for 55 months - it's
no wonder they are decreasing.

One big reason the Novice lost favor as the entry point
for new hams was its lack of privileges on the most popular VHF/UHF bands - 2 meters and 440, where most of the repeaters are.
Another reason was the reduction of the Technician written testing in 1987.
The difference in requirements of the two licenses was reduced while
the difference in privileges was so great that many either skipped the Novice
or spent only a short time before upgrading to Technician.

> Concentration on getting young newcomers into a hobby

If true, there's nothing wrong with that.

> product of parenthood or a surrogate for that?

It's about the future of amateur radio, and keeping
the diversity. All good things.

> It is > misplaced in a "community" whose active members are > predominently adult.

No, it isn't misplaced at all. Including young people in amateur radio is a good thing, not a problem.

Are saying we should NOT try to get more young people into amateur radio? Why not?

> Children don't have the monetary > base to build market sales which serve to benefit the > adults.

You'd be suprised how much buying power the under-21
folks have!

And even if they don't have the "monetary base" - so what?
Everything isn't about money. When the children grow older, they may have more money to spend on radio.

> Children don't have the experience to run
> events or keep organizations (predominently adult)
> together.

Very true - and amateur radio is one way for them
to see how events are run and organizations are kept together. It can give them a view into the world and help them learn. All good things.

> At best, the drive to "get youngsters
> interested" in a primarly-adult hobby seems to be > little more than eyewash, using politically-correct
> psycho phrases.

Now you're just getting nasty, Len. What's your problem
with young people being hams, and with efforts to recruit younger people?

The reason amateur radio is "primarily adult" is that young people don't stay young for long. A radio amateur who is licensed at the age of, say, 12 years and who continues as a ham for the rest of his/her life will spend only a small percent of their time as a "child ham".

One of the Basis and Purposes of the Amateur Radio Service is education. That alone is a valid reason to recruit young people to be radio amateurs, because the education they get from it can be very substantial. Besides the purely technical side, amateur radio can help teach geography, other languages,
time zones, government regulations, and much more.

> On the other hand, targeting an entrance drive for > amateur radio to teenagers will tend to steer them

Amateur Radio is for people of almost any age, not just "adults". It is not an age-specific activity.

> It will serve to show
> those beginners that there is an unknown facet of the > adult world ahead.

That's good! Amateur radio is one place where adults
and children can often interact as functional equals.

Young people do not need to be isolated from adults
and most adult activities. They need just the opposite - inclusion and integration, so they learn to be part of the community rather than alienated from it.

Of course there are a few activities that are not suitable for young people, but amateur radio isn't one of them.

> It can also serve to alienate
> them from their own peer group by making them
> "different." That is a not-good thing among teen> agers who seek the stability of "their" group, a

> natural psychological need in that part of their life.

That's pure and utter nonsense.

Any activity has the capacity to make a young person "different". Those who are involved in Scouting are "different" from those who are not involved. Those who learn a musical instrument are "different" from those who don't. Those involved in sports are "different" from those who aren't. Etc.

One of the main purposes of childhood and adolescence is self-discovery. It is a good thing for young people to try various activities to see what they enjoy and are good at.

Most young people who play sports will never be able to play professionally. Most young people who learn a musical instrument will never be able to be professional musicians. Most young people who perform in school plays will not become actors. That doesn't mean the activities have no value, just that the vast majority will never go beyond the recreational level of those activities.

But amateur radio can be the path to a number of careers, like engineering.

> My own experience on "entering HF" were rather drastic

But that's not the whole story, Len.

You all had at least a high school education, didn't you? All had passed various aptitude tests to become signalmen, didn't they?

You all went to microwave school, right? IIRC, that was at least six months of intensive training, and must have included a lot of radio theory and practice that wasn't specifically microwave technology - didn't it?

It wasn't like you and the others had no "radio-electronics" background at all, and had to start from scratch. While you may have not had specific "HF" training, was there no transfer from the training you did have?

> We were shown how to do it by more senior signalmen
> and we did it.

So you had experienced people to supervise, teach and guide everything you did, and make sure you did it right. You weren't on your own at all until the experienced people thought you were ready - right?

What you did was all according to set procedures that had been worked out carefully by trained and experienced people,
correct?

And you had all sorts of manuals, training materials, tools,
parts and test equipment to do the job - right?

> Those that did it wrong were shown
> why and had to practice getting it right. No re> criminations leveled, no "chewings out," no

All good stuff - but it all amounts to a considerable training period, doesn't it? A lot more than a few days.

> We all learned and did our tasks

I'm sure you did - and there were incentives to do so!

> (some > of which were considerably more complicated than any

Like what, Len? Compared to amateurs who have done
things like building and operating complete EME stations
on their own time, with only their own resources?

> So did those that
> came before us and those that came after us.

Right. As it should be.

Now I'll tell you about my experience on "entering HF".

I was one of those kids who was curious about all things electrical, from a very early age. By the age of 10 I was building simple receivers, and by the age of 12 I had built a working HF receiver. Almost all that I knew about radio came from various books because there were no radio
amateurs or electronics types in my family or immediate neighborhood before I came along. None of this was covered in school back then.

I still remember the look on my fifth grade teacher's face
when she caught me reading an electrical textbook in class.
She happened to open it to a page that showed diagrams of three-phase transformer connections, which I explained.....

Priceless.

I soon realized that in certain areas I knew far more than my teachers did, and that I couldn't expect much in those areas from school.

Almost all the parts for my radios came from old TV and BC receivers, or anything else electrical or electronic that
I could get my hands on.

Simple things like figuring out the inductance of a coil
required that I teach myself some basic algebra in order to understand the formulas. Practical stuff like soldering and metalwork I learned from the books and from trial-and-error.

And I learned Morse Code by listening to hams on the 80
meter band, and sending to myself with a home-made code
practice oscillator.

By age 13 I had earned the Novice license. My first transmitter was home-made - simple but effective. I had almost no test equipment and only a few tools - a lot of things were simply guessed at and cut-and-tried until they worked right. For example,
I had to figure out how to match the transmitter output to my random-wire antenna using a flashlight bulb as an RF indicator.

By age 14 I'd upgraded to Advanced, acquired a better transmitter, receiver and antenna, and was filling up log books with QSOs.

All with no formal training in electricity, radio, electronics,
almost no money, and the usual obligations of schoolwork,
chores, family activities, etc. My folks' contribution to my efforts was to allow me to do them if I got everything else
done first.

I wasn't any sort of prodigy or genius, just a motivated kid interested in radio. There were and are many like me, some even younger.

The point of this little personal history of mine is to illustrate
how different the environment and resources of most new amateur radio operators are. While few start out the way I did,
most are essentially working on their own, without formal training in radio, yet with the usual obligations of life. And their amateur radio activities are all self-funded.

A completely different environment than what you described for yourself.

How much more? All the military radios I've seen that are/were meant to be used by "line outfits" were made as simple to operate as possible. That paradigm goes all the way back to the WW2
BC-611 "walkie talkie".

> Radio training for line outfits
> is abbreviated to, at most, a couple weeks with most of

A couple weeks of intense formal training!

> Now,
> if they can all do that successfully in a short time,
> it makes no logical sense to have class stratification
> of being held in one class for a year or more.

The environments are completely different, Len. Most radio amateurs are essentially self-taught, in their spare time, using their own resources. What they could learn in a week or two of intense formal training might take a month to a year of part-time self-study.

More important, the only experience requirements for amateur licenses in the USA disappeared 30+ years ago.
Only the Advanced and Extra ever had such a requirement,
and the Advanced's 1 year requirement disappeared in 1953,
while the Extra's 2 year requirement was cut to 1 year in the early 1970s and then eliminated about 1975.

I think the entry-level license for a US ham license could be a lot better than the current Technician. What K2UNK proposes is a good starting point. But it's an uphill road with FCC because the NPRM clearly states that FCC doesn't see it that way.

The only licensed radio amateur with surname Gilliland in King County). A Tech class, not Extra.

Few in the east know the northwest, but King County takes

Seattle. Spokane, Washington, is in the EASTERN part, well away from Puget Sound and Seattle.

Agreed, Bill. The Technician privs are, IMHO,
not optimum for an entry-level license.

Makes sense to me.

The alternative would be to eliminate all license classes except
the Amateur Extra, and require all new hams to meet all the requirements of the Amateur Extra without any intermediate steps. While some can and would do so, it's clearly not the best way to do things.

> Firstly, having grades or levels of license is too
> much like the traditional union concept of work with
> levels of apprentice-journeyman-master.

Not really. If a person can meet the requirements of the higher class licenses, they can go right to General or Extra. The apprentice-journeyman system doesn't allow that, except perhaps in extraordinary circumstances.

Every month, a few dozen new licenses are issued to Generals and Extras. While that number is small compared to those who start out as Technicians, it proves that at least some new hams bypass one or both upgrading steps.

> Amateur radio
> isn't a union nor a guild nor a craft.

Len, you're the only one who makes that comparison. Even if it's valid, it means nothing in terms of how many Amateur Radio license classes should exist.

> Differing
> levels/classes of license only reinforce the already-
> present class-distinction social divisions in U.S.
> amateur radio.

Not really. The license classes exist for two reasons:

1) To offer an easy way to get started in amateur radio

2) To offer an easier path to full privileges than would exist with a single license class that required the same knowledge

Anyone who can meet the requirements of the various license classes can earn them. There's no age requirement, no educational requirement other than ability to pass the test, no income requirement other than ability to pay the testing fees (which is sometimes waived by the VEs).

In almost every human activity there are levels of achievement and recognition for same. Radio is no different in that respect than, say, golf, Scrabble,
model airplanes, or almost anything else.

> Operating a radio transmitter is, in reality, not a
> complex task

That depends on the transmitter. Some require a lot of skill and knowledge, others do not. And there is far more to amateur radio operation than "operating
a transmitter".

> nor is "amateur radio operation" some
> kind of mystical event, requiring perfect
> incantations to have some magic occur.

No magical incantations, although K0HB's idea of sacrificing a goat in the antenna farm may have some merit ;-)

But many forms of amateur radio operation do
require unique, specialized skills and
knowledge that most nonamateurs have not developed.

Perhaps this skill and knowledge requirement is why
you have such a dislike of Morse Code, Len. Morse Code operation in amateur radio usually involves skilled operators.

> Unlicensed
> (in radio) public safety people routinely do that.
> Unlicensed (in radio) aircraft crew routinely do that.
> Unlicensed (in radio) business people routinely do > that. Dozens of other examples are available where > unlicensed-in-radio individuals routinely operate
> radio transmitters without some long "training"
> period of months or years in order to be "proper"
> operators in radio.

Except that's not the whole story.

The people you cite do not "operate radio transmitters"
in the same sense that radio amateurs do. They are, in reality, radio users, not operators in the sense of amateur radio operators. They are not required to have much if any technical knowledge of their
radio equipment, nor does that equipment have any technical adjustments. In fact the radios are usually
set up so that the only adjustments are on-off-volume,
channel select, and maybe squelch. In many cases the latter two do not exist.

That they do not require radio operator licenses is proof of
that difference.

Nor do those radio users have much if any technical responsibility for the radios they use. That responsibility is carried by technical people who install, test and maintain the radios.
Of course the person who uses the radio may sometimes
also be the technical person, but that is not a requirement
of use.

On top of all that, the radio users cited above may not be FCC licensed, but they are trained, tested and often certified in proper radio procedures for the radios they use. For example, licenses to pilot aircraft with radios require that
the licensee know and demonstrate proper aircraft radio procedures. The pilot's license cannot be obtained without such radio procedure knowledge.

Amateur radio is completely different. A radio amateur
is, by definition and regulation, both operationally and technically responsible for his/her station. In the vast majority of situations, the radio amateur sets up his/her station
and operates it without special formal training, testing or certification other than the amateur radio license. So the license tests must be more comprehensive than those for
services where the "operator" is really more of a user.

Typical amateur radio equipment - particularly HF/MF
equipment - has many technical adjustments and controls.
Skill and knowledge are required to operate such radios
to best advantage.

Amateurs are also authorized to design, build, repair, and
modify their equipment without any formal certification or
type-acceptance requirements other than the spurious-emission rules in Part 97. Most other radio services do not have anything like that sort of freedom.

Unlike almost all other radio services, amateur radio is not formally channelized, particularly on HF/MF. And
unlike almost all other radio services, different modes
of transmission coexist on the same frequency bands.
For example, just between 7000 and 7300 kHz, one can
find amateurs using Morse Code, PSK31, RTTY, SSB,
AM, PACTOR, MFSK, SSTV, and a bunch of other modes,
without formal channelization and with only a few FCC
rules and voluntary bandplans to sort things out. Other
radio services are much more regimented, regulated, and ordered so as to eliminate the need for user skill and knowledge.

> I see absolutely no reason for

To do what sort of thing - have multiple license classes?

Yet FCC says they think the 3 level system is the optimum
one. That's not just my opinion - it's clearly stated in the NPRM.

Would you prefer the chaos of unregulation? Or perhaps much more regulation that would eliminate much of the freedom and flexibility radio amateurs enjoy?

> The Novice class license is a failure in the long > run.

For most of its history it was a great success in its original purpose, which was to ease the path into amateur radio. It was perhaps the best idea to come out of the restructuring of 1951.

If any license has been a failure at its original purpose, it is the Technician. That license was created to encourage the development and use of VHF/UHF after WW2, and not to be an entry-level license at all.
The original Technician license privileges were for 220 MHz and up. The license was intended for technically-oriented folks who wanted to tinker and build and experiment, and occasionally operate. Yet most Technicians then and now are primarily communicators, not builder/experimenters.

Only to someone like you, who attach such emotional baggage. "Novice" simply means "beginner" and is an

accurate name for a license class aimed at beginners.

Perhaps that emotional baggage is why you never held a Novice license, Len. Perhaps you disliked being known as a beginner.

That's just nonsense, Len.

After WW1 and before 1951, the only way to get started
in US amateur radio was to pass the Morse Code tests at 10 or 13 wpm (depending on whether the license was earned before or after 1936) and to pass the Class B/C written
exam of about 50 questions that included essays, diagrams
and many other areas of knowledge. While people as young as 9 years old managed to do that and earn the licenses, it was a big investment of resources just to get started.

The Novice offered an easier entry point, with slower Morse
Code testing and a much simpler written exam - and much less privileges. The idea was that it would be easier and better for new hams to learn-by-doing.

But there was no requirement to start with a Novice. Anyone who wanted to be a ham could start out with a Technician, General or Conditional, same as the old Class B and C
licenses they replaced.

> That can work on typical teen-agers who have yet to

Yet many adults started out as Novices.

Neither is it a reason to discard the concept. The details may need changing but the concept is valid. It offers a way
for newcomers to get started in amateur radio without having to make a large investment of resources.

> Time has shown that the
> newcomers have shunned the Novice class for decades;
> its class numbers are continuously decreasing.

No new Novices have been issued for 55 months - it's
no wonder they are decreasing.

One big reason the Novice lost favor as the entry point
for new hams was its lack of privileges on the most popular VHF/UHF bands - 2 meters and 440, where most of the repeaters are.
Another reason was the reduction of the Technician written testing in 1987.
The difference in requirements of the two licenses was reduced while
the difference in privileges was so great that many either skipped the Novice
or spent only a short time before upgrading to Technician.

If true, there's nothing wrong with that.

It's about the future of amateur radio, and keeping
the diversity. All good things.

> It is
> misplaced in a "community" whose active members are

No, it isn't misplaced at all. Including young people in amateur radio is a good thing, not a problem.

Are saying we should NOT try to get more young people into amateur radio? Why not?

> Children don't have the monetary
> base to build market sales which serve to benefit the

You'd be suprised how much buying power the under-21
folks have!

And even if they don't have the "monetary base" - so what?
Everything isn't about money. When the children grow
older, they may have more money to spend on radio.

> Children don't have the experience to run
> events or keep organizations (predominently adult)
> together.

Very true - and amateur radio is one way for them
to see how events are run and organizations are kept together. It can give them a view into the world and help them learn. All good things.

> At best, the drive to "get youngsters
> interested" in a primarly-adult hobby seems to be > little more than eyewash, using politically-correct
> psycho phrases.

Now you're just getting nasty, Len. What's your problem
with young people being hams, and with efforts to
recruit younger people?

The reason amateur radio is "primarily adult" is that young people don't stay young for long. A radio amateur who is licensed at the age of, say, 12 years and who continues as a ham for the rest of his/her life will spend only a small
percent of their time as a "child ham".

One of the Basis and Purposes of the Amateur Radio Service
is education. That alone is a valid reason to recruit young people to be radio amateurs, because the education they get from it can be very substantial. Besides the purely technical side,
amateur radio can help teach geography, other languages,
time zones, government regulations, and much more.

> On the other hand, targeting an entrance drive for

Amateur Radio is for people of almost any age, not just "adults". It is not an age-specific activity.

> It will serve to show
> those beginners that there is an unknown facet of the

That's good! Amateur radio is one place where adults
and children can often interact as functional equals.

Young people do not need to be isolated from adults
and most adult activities. They need just the opposite - inclusion and integration, so they learn to be part of the community rather than alienated from it.

Of course there are a few activities that are not suitable
for young people, but amateur radio isn't one of them.

That's pure and utter nonsense.

Any activity has the capacity to make a young person "different". Those who are involved in Scouting are "different" from those who are not involved. Those who learn a musical instrument are "different" from those who don't. Those involved in sports are "different" from those who aren't. Etc.

One of the main purposes of childhood and adolescence is self-discovery. It is a good thing for young people to try various activities to see what they enjoy and are good at.

Most young people who play sports will never be able to play professionally. Most young people who learn a musical instrument will never be able to be professional musicians. Most young people who perform in school plays will not become actors. That doesn't mean the activities have no value, just that the vast majority will never go beyond the recreational level of those activities.

But amateur radio can be the path to a number of careers, like engineering.

But that's not the whole story, Len.

You all had at least a high school education, didn't you? All had passed various aptitude tests to become signalmen, didn't they?

You all went to microwave school, right? IIRC, that was at least six months of intensive training, and must have included a lot of radio theory and practice that wasn't specifically microwave technology - didn't it?

It wasn't like you and the others had no "radio-electronics" background at all, and had to start from scratch. While you may have not had specific "HF" training, was there no transfer from the training you did have?

So you had experienced people to supervise, teach and guide everything you did, and make sure you did it right. You weren't on your own at all until the experienced people thought

What you did was all according to set procedures that had been worked out carefully by trained and experienced people,

All good stuff - but it all amounts to a considerable

Right. As it should be.

Now I'll tell you about my experience on "entering HF".

I was one of those kids who was curious about all things electrical, from a very early age. By the age of 10 I was building simple receivers, and by the age of 12 I had built a working HF receiver. Almost all that I knew about radio came from various books because there were no radio
amateurs or electronics types in my family or immediate neighborhood before I came along. None of this was covered in school back then.

I still remember the look on my fifth grade teacher's face
when she caught me reading an electrical textbook in class.
She happened to open it to a page that showed diagrams of three-phase transformer connections, which I explained.....

Priceless.

I soon realized that in certain areas I knew far more than my teachers did, and that I couldn't expect much in those areas from school.

Almost all the parts for my radios came from old TV and BC receivers, or anything else electrical or electronic that I could get my hands on.

Simple things like figuring out the inductance of a coil
required that I teach myself some basic algebra in order to understand the formulas. Practical stuff like soldering
and metalwork I learned from the books and from trial-and-error.

And I learned Morse Code by listening to hams on the 80
meter band, and sending to myself with a home-made code
practice oscillator.

By age 13 I had earned the Novice license. My first transmitter was home-made - simple but effective. I had almost no
test equipment and only a few tools - a lot of things were simply guessed at and cut-and-tried until they worked right. For example,
I had to figure out how to match the transmitter output to my random-wire antenna using a flashlight bulb as an RF indicator.

By age 14 I'd upgraded to Advanced, acquired a better transmitter, receiver and antenna, and was filling up log books with QSOs.

All with no formal training in electricity, radio, electronics,
almost no money, and the usual obligations of schoolwork,
chores, family activities, etc. My folks' contribution to my efforts was to allow me to do them if I got everything else
done first.

I wasn't any sort of prodigy or genius, just a motivated kid interested in radio. There were and are many like me, some even younger.

The point of this little personal history of mine is to illustrate
how different the environment and resources of most new amateur radio operators are. While few start out the way I did,
most are essentially working on their own, without formal training in radio, yet with the usual obligations of life. And their amateur radio activities are all self-funded.

A completely different environment than what you described for yourself.

How much more? All the military radios I've seen that are/were meant to be used by "line outfits" were made as simple to operate as possible. That paradigm goes all the way back to the WW2
BC-611 "walkie talkie".

> Radio training for line outfits

A couple weeks of intense formal training!

The environments are completely different, Len. Most
radio amateurs are essentially self-taught, in their spare time, using their own resources. What they could learn
in a week or two of intense formal training might take a month to a year of part-time self-study.

More important, the only experience requirements for
amateur licenses in the USA disappeared 30+ years ago.
Only the Advanced and Extra ever had such a requirement,
and the Advanced's 1 year requirement disappeared in 1953,
while the Extra's 2 year requirement was cut to 1 year in the early 1970s and then eliminated about 1975.

I think the entry-level license for a US ham license could be a lot better than the current Technician. What K2UNK proposes is a good starting point. But it's an uphill road with FCC because the NPRM clearly states that FCC doesn't see it that way.

Agreed, Bill. The Technician privs are, IMHO,
not optimum for an entry-level license.

Makes sense to me.

The alternative would be to eliminate all license classes except
the Amateur Extra, and require all new hams to meet all the requirements of the Amateur Extra without any intermediate steps. While some can and would do so, it's clearly not the best way to do things.

> Firstly, having grades or levels of license is too
> much like the traditional union concept of work with
> levels of apprentice-journeyman-master.

Not really. If a person can meet the requirements of the higher class licenses, they can go right to General or Extra. The apprentice-journeyman system doesn't allow that, except perhaps in extraordinary circumstances.

Every month, a few dozen new licenses are issued to Generals and Extras. While that number is small compared to those who start out as Technicians, it proves that at least some new hams bypass one or both upgrading steps.

> Amateur radio
> isn't a union nor a guild nor a craft.

Len, you're the only one who makes that comparison. Even if it's valid, it means nothing in terms of how many Amateur Radio license classes should exist.

> Differing
> levels/classes of license only reinforce the already-
> present class-distinction social divisions in U.S.
> amateur radio.

Not really. The license classes exist for two reasons:

1) To offer an easy way to get started in amateur radio

2) To offer an easier path to full privileges than would exist with a single license class that required the same knowledge

Anyone who can meet the requirements of the various license classes can earn them. There's no age requirement, no educational requirement other than ability to pass the test, no income requirement other than ability to pay the testing fees (which is sometimes waived by the VEs).

In almost every human activity there are levels of achievement and recognition for same. Radio is no different in that respect than, say, golf, Scrabble,
model airplanes, or almost anything else.

> Operating a radio transmitter is, in reality, not a

That depends on the transmitter. Some require a lot of skill and knowledge, others do not. And there is far more to amateur radio operation than "operating
a transmitter".

No magical incantations, although K0HB's idea of sacrificing a goat in the antenna farm may have some merit ;-)

But many forms of amateur radio operation do
require unique, specialized skills and
knowledge that most nonamateurs have not developed.

Perhaps this skill and knowledge requirement is why
you have such a dislike of Morse Code, Len. Morse Code operation in amateur radio usually involves
skilled operators.

> (in radio) public safety people routinely do that.

Except that's not the whole story.

The people you cite do not "operate radio transmitters"
in the same sense that radio amateurs do. They are, in reality, radio users, not operators in the sense of amateur radio operators. They are not required to have much if any technical knowledge of their
radio equipment, nor does that equipment have any technical adjustments. In fact the radios are usually
set up so that the only adjustments are on-off-volume,
channel select, and maybe squelch. In many cases the latter two do not exist.

That they do not require radio operator licenses is proof of
that difference.

Nor do those radio users have much if any technical responsibility for the radios they use. That responsibility is carried by technical people who install, test and maintain the radios.
Of course the person who uses the radio may sometimes
also be the technical person, but that is not a requirement
of use.

On top of all that, the radio users cited above may not be FCC licensed, but they are trained, tested and often certified in proper radio procedures for the radios they use. For example, licenses to pilot aircraft with radios require that
the licensee know and demonstrate proper aircraft radio procedures. The pilot's license cannot be obtained without such radio procedure knowledge.

Amateur radio is completely different. A radio amateur
is, by definition and regulation, both operationally and technically responsible for his/her station. In the vast majority of situations, the radio amateur sets up his/her station
and operates it without special formal training, testing or certification other than the amateur radio license. So the license tests must be more comprehensive than those for
services where the "operator" is really more of a user.

Typical amateur radio equipment - particularly HF/MF
equipment - has many technical adjustments and controls.
Skill and knowledge are required to operate such radios
to best advantage.

Amateurs are also authorized to design, build, repair, and
modify their equipment without any formal certification or
type-acceptance requirements other than the spurious-emission rules in Part 97. Most other radio services do not have anything like that sort of freedom.

Unlike almost all other radio services, amateur radio is not formally channelized, particularly on HF/MF. And
unlike almost all other radio services, different modes
of transmission coexist on the same frequency bands.
For example, just between 7000 and 7300 kHz, one can
find amateurs using Morse Code, PSK31, RTTY, SSB,
AM, PACTOR, MFSK, SSTV, and a bunch of other modes,
without formal channelization and with only a few FCC
rules and voluntary bandplans to sort things out. Other
radio services are much more regimented, regulated, and ordered so as to eliminate the need for user skill and knowledge.

To do what sort of thing - have multiple license classes?

Yet FCC says they think the 3 level system is the optimum
one. That's not just my opinion - it's clearly stated in the NPRM.

Would you prefer the chaos of unregulation? Or perhaps much more regulation that would eliminate much of the freedom and flexibility radio amateurs enjoy?

> The Novice class license is a failure in the long

For most of its history it was a great success in its original purpose, which was to ease the path into amateur radio. It was perhaps the best idea to come out of the restructuring of 1951.

If any license has been a failure at its original purpose, it is the Technician. That license was created to encourage the development and use of VHF/UHF after WW2, and not to be an entry-level license at all.
The original Technician license privileges were for 220 MHz and up. The license was intended for technically-oriented folks who wanted to tinker and build and experiment, and occasionally operate. Yet most Technicians then and now are primarily communicators, not builder/experimenters.

Only to someone like you, who attach such emotional baggage. "Novice" simply means "beginner" and is an

accurate name for a license class aimed at beginners.

Perhaps that emotional baggage is why you never held a Novice license, Len. Perhaps you disliked being known as a beginner.

That's just nonsense, Len.

After WW1 and before 1951, the only way to get started
in US amateur radio was to pass the Morse Code tests at 10 or 13 wpm (depending on whether the license was earned before or after 1936) and to pass the Class B/C written
exam of about 50 questions that included essays, diagrams
and many other areas of knowledge. While people as young as 9 years old managed to do that and earn the licenses, it was a big investment of resources just to get started.

The Novice offered an easier entry point, with slower Morse
Code testing and a much simpler written exam - and much less privileges. The idea was that it would be easier and better for new hams to learn-by-doing.

But there was no requirement to start with a Novice. Anyone who wanted to be a ham could start out with a Technician, General or Conditional, same as the old Class B and C
licenses they replaced.

Yet many adults started out as Novices.

Neither is it a reason to discard the concept. The details may need changing but the concept is valid. It offers a way
for newcomers to get started in amateur radio without having to make a large investment of resources.

> Time has shown that the
> newcomers have shunned the Novice class for decades;
> its class numbers are continuously decreasing.

No new Novices have been issued for 55 months - it's
no wonder they are decreasing.

One big reason the Novice lost favor as the entry point
for new hams was its lack of privileges on the most popular VHF/UHF bands - 2 meters and 440, where most of the repeaters are.
Another reason was the reduction of the Technician written testing in 1987.
The difference in requirements of the two licenses was reduced while
the difference in privileges was so great that many either skipped the Novice
or spent only a short time before upgrading to Technician.

If true, there's nothing wrong with that.

It's about the future of amateur radio, and keeping
the diversity. All good things.

No, it isn't misplaced at all. Including young people in amateur radio is a good thing, not a problem.

Are saying we should NOT try to get more young people into amateur radio? Why not?

> Children don't have the monetary

You'd be suprised how much buying power the under-21
folks have!

And even if they don't have the "monetary base" - so what?
Everything isn't about money. When the children grow
older, they may have more money to spend on radio.

> Children don't have the experience to run
> events or keep organizations (predominently adult)

Very true - and amateur radio is one way for them
to see how events are run and organizations are kept together. It can give them a view into the world and help them learn. All good things.

> At best, the drive to "get youngsters
> interested" in a primarly-adult hobby seems to be

Now you're just getting nasty, Len. What's your problem
with young people being hams, and with efforts to
recruit younger people?

The reason amateur radio is "primarily adult" is that young people don't stay young for long. A radio amateur who is licensed at the age of, say, 12 years and who continues as a ham for the rest of his/her life will spend only a small
percent of their time as a "child ham".

One of the Basis and Purposes of the Amateur Radio Service
is education. That alone is a valid reason to recruit young people to be radio amateurs, because the education they get from it can be very substantial. Besides the purely technical side,
amateur radio can help teach geography, other languages,
time zones, government regulations, and much more.

amateur licenses in the USA disappeared 30+ years ago.
Only the Advanced and Extra ever had such a requirement,
and the Advanced's 1 year requirement disappeared in 1953,
while the Extra's 2 year requirement was cut to 1 year in the

I think the entry-level license for a US ham license could be a lot better than the current Technician. What K2UNK proposes

the NPRM clearly states that FCC doesn't see it that way.

I think it's awful, but that's not the point of this discussion. In

Agreed, Bill. The Technician privs are, IMHO,
not optimum for an entry-level license.

The alternative would be to eliminate all license classes except
the Amateur Extra, and require all new hams to meet all the requirements of the Amateur Extra without any intermediate steps. While some can and would do so, it's clearly not the best way to do things.

> Firstly, having grades or levels of license is too
> much like the traditional union concept of work with
> levels of apprentice-journeyman-master.

Not really. If a person can meet the requirements of the higher class licenses, they can go right to General or Extra. The apprentice-journeyman system doesn't allow that, except perhaps in extraordinary circumstances.

Every month, a few dozen new licenses are issued to Generals and Extras. While that number is small compared to those who start out as Technicians, it proves that at least some new hams bypass one or both upgrading steps.

> Amateur radio
> isn't a union nor a guild nor a craft.

Len, you're the only one who makes that comparison. Even if it's valid, it means nothing in terms of how many Amateur Radio license classes should exist.

> Differing
> levels/classes of license only reinforce the already-
> present class-distinction social divisions in U.S.
> amateur radio.

Not really. The license classes exist for two reasons:

1) To offer an easy way to get started in amateur radio

2) To offer an easier path to full privileges than would exist with a single license class that required the same knowledge

Anyone who can meet the requirements of the various license classes can earn them. There's no age requirement, no educational requirement other than ability to pass the test, no income requirement other than ability to pay the testing fees (which is sometimes waived by the VEs).

In almost every human activity there are levels of achievement and recognition for same. Radio is no different in that respect than, say, golf, Scrabble,
model airplanes, or almost anything else.

> Operating a radio transmitter is, in reality, not a

That depends on the transmitter. Some require a lot of skill and knowledge, others do not. And there is far more to amateur radio operation than "operating
a transmitter".

> nor is "amateur radio operation" some

No magical incantations, although K0HB's idea of sacrificing a goat in the antenna farm may have some merit ;-)

But many forms of amateur radio operation do
require unique, specialized skills and
knowledge that most nonamateurs have not developed.

Perhaps this skill and knowledge requirement is why
you have such a dislike of Morse Code, Len. Morse Code operation in amateur radio usually involves skilled operators.

> Unlicensed
> (in radio) public safety people routinely do that.

Except that's not the whole story.

The people you cite do not "operate radio transmitters"
in the same sense that radio amateurs do. They are, in reality, radio users, not operators in the sense of amateur radio operators. They are not required to have much if any technical knowledge of their
radio equipment, nor does that equipment have any technical adjustments. In fact the radios are usually
set up so that the only adjustments are on-off-volume,
channel select, and maybe squelch. In many cases the latter two do not exist.

That they do not require radio operator licenses is proof of
that difference.

Nor do those radio users have much if any technical responsibility for the radios they use. That responsibility is carried by technical people who install, test and maintain the radios.
Of course the person who uses the radio may sometimes
also be the technical person, but that is not a requirement
of use.

On top of all that, the radio users cited above may not be FCC licensed, but they are trained, tested and often certified in proper radio procedures for the radios they use. For example, licenses to pilot aircraft with radios require that
the licensee know and demonstrate proper aircraft radio procedures. The pilot's license cannot be obtained without such radio procedure knowledge.

Amateur radio is completely different. A radio amateur
is, by definition and regulation, both operationally and technically responsible for his/her station. In the vast majority of situations, the radio amateur sets up his/her station
and operates it without special formal training, testing or certification other than the amateur radio license. So the license tests must be more comprehensive than those for
services where the "operator" is really more of a user.

Typical amateur radio equipment - particularly HF/MF
equipment - has many technical adjustments and controls.
Skill and knowledge are required to operate such radios
to best advantage.

Amateurs are also authorized to design, build, repair, and
modify their equipment without any formal certification or
type-acceptance requirements other than the spurious-emission rules in Part 97. Most other radio services do not have anything like that sort of freedom.

Unlike almost all other radio services, amateur radio is not formally channelized, particularly on HF/MF. And
unlike almost all other radio services, different modes
of transmission coexist on the same frequency bands.
For example, just between 7000 and 7300 kHz, one can
find amateurs using Morse Code, PSK31, RTTY, SSB,
AM, PACTOR, MFSK, SSTV, and a bunch of other modes,
without formal channelization and with only a few FCC
rules and voluntary bandplans to sort things out. Other
radio services are much more regimented, regulated, and ordered so as to eliminate the need for user skill and knowledge.

To do what sort of thing - have multiple license classes?

Yet FCC says they think the 3 level system is the optimum
one. That's not just my opinion - it's clearly stated in the NPRM.

Would you prefer the chaos of unregulation? Or perhaps much more regulation that would eliminate much of the freedom and flexibility radio amateurs enjoy?

> The Novice class license is a failure in the long

For most of its history it was a great success in its original purpose, which was to ease the path into amateur radio. It was perhaps the best idea to come out of the restructuring of 1951.

If any license has been a failure at its original purpose, it is the Technician. That license was created to encourage the development and use of VHF/UHF after WW2, and not to be an entry-level license at all.
The original Technician license privileges were for 220 MHz and up. The license was intended for technically-oriented folks who wanted to tinker and build and experiment, and occasionally operate. Yet most Technicians then and now are primarily communicators, not builder/experimenters.

Only to someone like you, who attach such emotional baggage. "Novice" simply means "beginner" and is an

accurate name for a license class aimed at beginners.

Perhaps that emotional baggage is why you never held a Novice license, Len. Perhaps you disliked being known as a beginner.

That's just nonsense, Len.

After WW1 and before 1951, the only way to get started
in US amateur radio was to pass the Morse Code tests at 10 or 13 wpm (depending on whether the license was earned before or after 1936) and to pass the Class B/C written
exam of about 50 questions that included essays, diagrams
and many other areas of knowledge. While people as young as 9 years old managed to do that and earn the licenses, it was a big investment of resources just to get started.

The Novice offered an easier entry point, with slower Morse
Code testing and a much simpler written exam - and much less privileges. The idea was that it would be easier and better for new hams to learn-by-doing.

But there was no requirement to start with a Novice. Anyone who wanted to be a ham could start out with a Technician, General or Conditional, same as the old Class B and C
licenses they replaced.

Yet many adults started out as Novices.

Neither is it a reason to discard the concept. The details may need changing but the concept is valid. It offers a way
for newcomers to get started in amateur radio without having to make a large investment of resources.

> Time has shown that the
> newcomers have shunned the Novice class for decades;
> its class numbers are continuously decreasing.

No new Novices have been issued for 55 months - it's
no wonder they are decreasing.

One big reason the Novice lost favor as the entry point
for new hams was its lack of privileges on the most popular VHF/UHF bands - 2 meters and 440, where most of the repeaters are.
Another reason was the reduction of the Technician written testing in 1987.
The difference in requirements of the two licenses was reduced while
the difference in privileges was so great that many either skipped the Novice
or spent only a short time before upgrading to Technician.

If true, there's nothing wrong with that.

It's about the future of amateur radio, and keeping
the diversity. All good things.

No, it isn't misplaced at all. Including young people in amateur radio is a good thing, not a problem.

Are saying we should NOT try to get more young people into amateur radio? Why not?

> Children don't have the monetary

You'd be suprised how much buying power the under-21
folks have!

And even if they don't have the "monetary base" - so what?
Everything isn't about money. When the children grow
older, they may have more money to spend on radio.

> Children don't have the experience to run
> events or keep organizations (predominently adult)
> together.

Very true - and amateur radio is one way for them
to see how events are run and organizations are kept together. It can give them a view into the world and help them learn. All good things.

> At best, the drive to "get youngsters
> interested" in a primarly-adult hobby seems to be

Now you're just getting nasty, Len. What's your problem
with young people being hams, and with efforts to
recruit younger people?

The reason amateur radio is "primarily adult" is that young people don't stay young for long. A radio amateur who is licensed at the age of, say, 12 years and who continues as a ham for the rest of his/her life will spend only a small
percent of their time as a "child ham".

One of the Basis and Purposes of the Amateur Radio Service
is education. That alone is a valid reason to recruit young people to be radio amateurs, because the education they get from it can be very substantial. Besides the purely technical side,
amateur radio can help teach geography, other languages,
time zones, government regulations, and much more.

> On the other hand, targeting an entrance drive for

Amateur Radio is for people of almost any age, not just "adults". It is not an age-specific activity.

> It will serve to show
> those beginners that there is an unknown facet of the > adult world ahead.

That's good! Amateur radio is one place where adults
and children can often interact as functional equals.

Young people do not need to be isolated from adults
and most adult activities. They need just the opposite - inclusion and integration, so they learn to be part of the community rather than alienated from it.

Of course there are a few activities that are not suitable
for young people, but amateur radio isn't one of them.

> It can also serve to alienate
> them from their own peer group by making them
> "different." That is a not-good thing among teen> agers who seek the stability of "their" group, a

> natural psychological need in that part of their life.

That's pure and utter nonsense.

Any activity has the capacity to make a young person "different". Those who are involved in Scouting are "different" from those who are not involved. Those who learn a musical instrument are "different" from those who don't. Those involved in sports are "different" from those who aren't. Etc.

One of the main purposes of childhood and adolescence is self-discovery. It is a good thing for young people to try various activities to see what they enjoy and are good at.

Most young people who play sports will never be able to play professionally. Most young people who learn a musical instrument will never be able to be professional musicians. Most young people who perform in school plays will not become actors. That doesn't mean the activities have no value, just that the vast majority will never go beyond the recreational level of those activities.

But amateur radio can be the path to a number of careers, like engineering.

> My own experience on "entering HF" were rather drastic

But that's not the whole story, Len.

You all had at least a high school education, didn't you? All had passed various aptitude tests to become signalmen, didn't they?

You all went to microwave school, right? IIRC, that was at least six months of intensive training, and must have included a lot of radio theory and practice that wasn't specifically microwave technology - didn't it?

It wasn't like you and the others had no "radio-electronics" background at all, and had to start from scratch. While you may have not had specific "HF" training, was there no transfer from the training you did have?

> We were shown how to do it by more senior signalmen
> and we did it.

So you had experienced people to supervise, teach and guide everything you did, and make sure you did it right. You weren't on your own at all until the experienced people thought

you were ready - right?

What you did was all according to set procedures that had been worked out carefully by trained and experienced people,
correct?

And you had all sorts of manuals, training materials, tools,
parts and test equipment to do the job - right?

> Those that did it wrong were shown
> why and had to practice getting it right. No re-

All good stuff - but it all amounts to a considerable training period, doesn't it? A lot more than a few days.

> We all learned and did our tasks

I'm sure you did - and there were incentives to do so!

> (some

Like what, Len? Compared to amateurs who have done
things like building and operating complete EME stations
on their own time, with only their own resources?

> So did those that
> came before us and those that came after us.

Right. As it should be.

Now I'll tell you about my experience on "entering HF".

I was one of those kids who was curious about all things electrical, from a very early age. By the age of 10 I was building simple receivers, and by the age of 12 I had built a working HF receiver. Almost all that I knew about radio came from various books because there were no radio
amateurs or electronics types in my family or immediate neighborhood before I came along. None of this was covered in school back then.

I still remember the look on my fifth grade teacher's face
when she caught me reading an electrical textbook in class.
She happened to open it to a page that showed diagrams of three-phase transformer connections, which I explained.....

Priceless.

I soon realized that in certain areas I knew far more than my teachers did, and that I couldn't expect much in those areas from school.

Almost all the parts for my radios came from old TV and BC receivers, or anything else electrical or electronic that I could get my hands on.

Simple things like figuring out the inductance of a coil
required that I teach myself some basic algebra in order to understand the formulas. Practical stuff like soldering
and metalwork I learned from the books and from trial-and-error.

And I learned Morse Code by listening to hams on the 80
meter band, and sending to myself with a home-made code
practice oscillator.

By age 13 I had earned the Novice license. My first transmitter was home-made - simple but effective. I had almost no
test equipment and only a few tools - a lot of things were simply guessed at and cut-and-tried until they worked right. For example,
I had to figure out how to match the transmitter output to my random-wire antenna using a flashlight bulb as an RF indicator.

By age 14 I'd upgraded to Advanced, acquired a better transmitter, receiver and antenna, and was filling up log books with QSOs.

All with no formal training in electricity, radio, electronics,
almost no money, and the usual obligations of schoolwork,
chores, family activities, etc. My folks' contribution to my efforts was to allow me to do them if I got everything else
done first.

I wasn't any sort of prodigy or genius, just a motivated kid interested in radio. There were and are many like me, some even younger.

The point of this little personal history of mine is to illustrate
how different the environment and resources of most new amateur radio operators are. While few start out the way I did,
most are essentially working on their own, without formal training in radio, yet with the usual obligations of life. And their amateur radio activities are all self-funded.

A completely different environment than what you described for yourself.

> I can draw a parallel to the activities of infantry,

How much more? All the military radios I've seen that are/were meant to be used by "line outfits" were made as simple to operate as possible. That paradigm goes all the way back to the WW2
BC-611 "walkie talkie".

> Radio training for line outfits
> is abbreviated to, at most, a couple weeks with most of

A couple weeks of intense formal training!

> Now,
> if they can all do that successfully in a short time,

The environments are completely different, Len. Most
radio amateurs are essentially self-taught, in their spare time, using their own resources. What they could learn
in a week or two of intense formal training might take a month to a year of part-time self-study.

More important, the only experience requirements for
amateur licenses in the USA disappeared 30+ years ago.
Only the Advanced and Extra ever had such a requirement,
and the Advanced's 1 year requirement disappeared in 1953,
while the Extra's 2 year requirement was cut to 1 year in the

No bravos needed, Steve.

The point I was making is that military service people aren't the only ones

with potentially dangerous jobs, nor a commitment to do what is necessary
at great risk to themselves. It was not meant in any way to denigrate, deny or minimize the commitment and sacrifices made by our military - past, present
and future.

But what I was trying to say could have been written a lot better than I wrote it.

> However if you get into the habit of "apologizing" everytime

In my experience, Hans/K0HB does not offend easily, nor ask for apologies lightly. That he was offended by what I wrote proved to me that my post wasn't very well written, since my goal was not to offend him!

> Spending your life with your tail between your legs is no way to

I don't consider anything I've written here to be "my tail between my legs". Just the opposite.

Heeheeheeheeheeheehee...Dud got trapped again!

The only licensed radio amateur with surname Gilliland in Washington state is C. Frank Gilliland, N7VCF, Issaquah (in King County). A Tech class, not Extra.

Few in the east know the northwest, but King County takes in Seattle (in WEST Washington) and Issaquah is a suburb of Seattle. Spokane, Washington, is in the EASTERN part, well away from Puget Sound and Seattle.

It's almost too easy to entrap Dudly...! :-)

We will never know the REAL story from Dudly. :-)

Maybe "Iitoi," legend of the Tohono O'odham people, can get the Great Spirit to explain it to us? :-)

Dudly is farther and farther into the Maze of that legend and hasn't been able to get out yet.

I have to butt in here.....

Radio communication has two parts: 'Radio' and 'Communication'. From what I have seen over the years, hams seem to be more concerned with the 'radio' than the 'communication'. IOW, many hams have developed technical skills but too few have developed communication skills for use with the radio. The radio is just a tool -- a device that allows the operator to communicate. Unfortunately, the written test doesn't require an applicant to prove communication skills beyond the ability to memorize the answers to the pool questions.

Morse Code is no exception. Knowing Morse Code does not a skilled communicator make. All it means is that some knob-turner can tap out the alphabet; and all that's required to pass the Morse test is a rudimentary skill level. Or am I wrong? If a third-grader can read and write a few words using all the letters of the alphabet, does that make him/her a skilled communicator? Of course not..... except maybe on a third-grade level. And a skilled communicator doesn't necessarily need a technically complex tranceiver with all the bells and whistles. Even a cheap CB radio can (and frequently does) get the job done if it can be used as a means of communication (flame retardant suit on).

Personally, I think that Morse -should- be required for several reasons, not the least of which is because it's a language that's used and understood internationally. But if the amateur isn't required to have the communication skills needed to use Morse to its minimum potential, why even bother to make it a requirement? at a skill level that has little practical application? and especially when no other communication skills are required?

It really doesn't matter anyway. The ARRL wants to make ARS testing as easy as possible to increase its membership; i.e, revenue. And since they control the ARS lobby, the point is moot -- color the code gone.

It's all good though, because maybe hams will then be able to focus a little more on the neglected aspect of radio communication.

It is much easier to go negitive than remain positive (that is why it happens so often on Usenet) but in your case you started negeitive back in 98 when you arrived here in RRAP some of the first words off your keybaord were calling lazy then you escalated

now we are at this sorry spot but your answer is to lie and throw more wood and oil on the fire rather than agree to stop forging posts stop lying about people personal life and stop being a barabrain

I guess this means ytou truly don't understand your actions (which would border on cominemtn right there but still needs a things or 2) or that you truly have nothing positive to say

The ONLY alternative? :-)

It isn't logical to have ONE license labeled "Extra." :-)

How often have we heard "ham radio isn't for everyone!"

:-)

Yes, REALLY. Amateur radio is NOT an occupation.

Says who? The only Guild I have a card for doesn't require those levels.

Why does one have to "upgrade" through license classes? "Upgrading" can be done for oneself, to keep abrest of technology advancements (see the old "Amateurs Code" on that).

If there were only ONE license, there would be no
"upgrading" via licenses, would there?

But, such a one-class system would take away all the "fun" that some have of needing to be "better than others!" :-)

>> Amateur radio isn't a union nor a guild nor a craft.
>
>Len, you're the only one who makes that comparison.

No, I got that from a licensed radio amateur some years ago. It IS parallel to the license classes as well as the thinking of those needing rank-status-privilege "upgrades" for longer-tenured amateurs.

>Even if it's valid, it means nothing in terms of how many >Amateur Radio license classes should exist.

Well now, I just don't think ANY multiple classes should exist. ONE license. How about that?

>Not really. The license classes exist for two reasons:
>
>1) To offer an easy way to get started in amateur radio

One can't go into an HRO, plunk down plastic, walk out with a working two-way radio? :-)

What would be easier?

>2) To offer an easier path to full privileges than would >exist with a single license class that required the same
>knowledge

Removing the artificiality of all that class distinction with carrot-stick "privileges" would erase all of that.

Face it, Jimmie, all those classes GREW in order to satisfy some POLITICAL reasons within the amateur community. In the beginning there was only ONE license.

>Anyone who can meet the requirements of the >various license classes can earn them.

"Earn them?" :-) "I load sixteen tons and what do I get?"

[ol' Ern singing away a once popular song :-)]

If there were NO classes, just ONE license, wouldn't the applicants have "earned" those?

In the beginning there was only ONE license.

>> It is a HOBBY,
>
>And a lot more!

As far as the federal government is concerned, it is a NON-PAYING radio activity that is expressly forbidden to broadcast or engage in common-carrier communications. That boils down to a HOBBY.

>It's also done for public service.

Jimmie, grow up. You are NOT the ARRL trying to do a snow job on the public, trying to get more membership.

Amateur radio is basically a HOBBY.

Hobbies, ALL hobbies, can be made into a "service" for SOME of the public.

Now, if you thought you were doing some "service" to the nation, you are delusional. In Title 47 C.F.R., the word "service" is used as a regulatory word meaning the type and kind of radio activity being regulated by a Part, ALL Parts.

Amateur radio is basically a HOBBY.

Individuals engaged in that HOBBY are licensed because the FCC, the federal agency regulating all civil radio, think that licensing is a tool of regulation.

>In almost every human activity there are levels of >achievement and recognition for same.

"Recognition?" Tsk, now you are back to CLASS DISTINCTION
again!

Level of achievement with a no-class, one-license
system: Have a license or not have a license.

>> Operating a radio transmitter is, in reality, not a

>That depends on the transmitter. Some require a lot

Crap. It isn't anywhere close to rocket science.

If very ordinary young men can operate multi-control
vacuum tube transmitters of high power output with success and rapidity with only a few days of on-the-job instruction, then your "lot of skill and knowledge" is crap squared.

>And there is >far more to amateur radio operation than "operating
>a transmitter".

Anyone, with or without a license can operate a RECEIVER. Crap-cubed, Jimmie.

UNLICENSED people by the thousands every day in the USA are OPERATING TRANSCEIVERS.

Crap to the fourth power, Jimmie.

>Perhaps this skill and knowledge requirement is why
>you have such a dislike of Morse Code, Len. Morse >Code operation in amateur radio usually involves
>skilled operators.

Crap to the fifth power, Jimmie.

Don't try that "you ain't good enough to be in the same universe as you morsemen."

"Morse code operation in amateur radio" does NOT involve ALL "skilled operators." Is 5 WPM rate something that is "skilled?" Geez, Jimmie, you've written that "20 WPM CW [code] isn't high rate."
You elevated yourself to being better than most with morse and you deride thousands of old extras who passed a 20 WPM test. Tsk, tsk.

The license test element 1 doesn't involve full-day shifts of relaying messages on some net, doesn't involve emergency messaging from ships or people in danger, doesn't involve anything but a very simple test of cognition. VECs can delete sending tests at their option.

If you've looked at the ARRL home page lately you would have seen a little Quiz box. 45.6 percent of those who took that Quiz said they NEVER used radiotelegraphy!

>The people you cite do not "operate radio transmitters"
>in the same sense that radio amateurs do. They are, in >reality, radio users, not operators in the sense of >amateur radio operators.

The radios they USE are either owned by their employers (businesses, public safety agences as examples) or themselves (private boat or aircraft owners as an example). Some of those radios DO require a licensed person to oversee their operation and technical details, but some do NOT. Depends on the particular radio service.

>They are not required to have >much if any technical knowledge of their
>radio equipment, nor does that equipment have any >technical adjustments.

An amateur radio license is ALSO a radio station license.
That is the difference. Amateurs ARE allowed to build their own transmitters (within limits of regulations) but all other radio services (some exceptions in Part 15 devices) require type-acceptance of RF emitters.

Being allowed to home-build does NOT impact USE, Jimmie.
Amateur USE is the same whether home-built or ready-built. "Adjustment" to meet the technical requirements of Part 97 is NOT USE.

> In fact the radios are usually
>set up so that the only adjustments are on-off-volume,
>channel select, and maybe squelch. In many cases the >latter two do not exist.

You forgot the Push-To-Talk "adjustment." :-)

In case you are wondering about some boat or aircraft owners, take a look at a popular seller of private marine radios, SGC in Belleview, WA. Their SGC 2020 model is for both marine and amateur HF bands, the chief difference being in frequency control ranges. The front panel controls are the same and not as simple as you describe. [there's plenty of other examples, especially in small-boat radar] In general aviation craft, the civil communications band transceiver IS simple. It should be since a pilot has to give their attention to FLYING, not playing ham. Add to that the civil navigation band receiver with OBS for VOR, the crossed needles for LOC and GS, the Marker Beacon lights, is NOT "simple." Toss in the transponder and its operation (not complex, but woe if you squawk the wrong code these days!).

>That they do not require radio operator licenses is proof of
>that difference.

Crap to the sixth power, Jimmie. The REGULATIONS were SIMPLIFIED to streamline them by removing old, antiquated regulations that no longer benefitted anyone. The governments (worldwide) did that.

This isn't 1920 and some ship's radio room with a single "skilled" radio operator the only one "qualified" to operate a spark transmitter and crystal set receiver.
Times have changed.

>On top of all that, the radio users cited above may not be >FCC licensed, but they are trained, tested and often certified in >proper radio procedures for the radios they use.

"Certified?" They get neat little certificates (suitable for framing)? Wow!

Each and every radio service has their own set of jargon
and lingo, plus communications procedures. <shrug> So?
They generall use the same lingo and jargon when using wired telephones. It is JOB-SPECIFIC.

>For
>example, licenses to pilot aircraft with radios require that
>the licensee know and demonstrate proper aircraft radio >procedures. The pilot's license cannot be obtained without >such radio procedure knowledge.

By the Federal AVIATION Administration, NOT the FCC.

The FAA makes the regulations for flying/piloting, Jimmie.

>Amateur radio is completely different.

Amateur radio is basically a HOBBY. Pilots don't go chasing DX or engaging in contact contests or sending QSLs.
Ignore a ham transceiver and all you do is miss a contact or two, maybe offend the person at the other end. Ignore an airplane's attitude or instruments and it crashes and the pilot is DEAD, perhaps with many more on the ground.

Completely different. I agree.

>A radio amateur
>is, by definition and regulation, both operationally and >technically responsible for his/her station.

Tsk, the vast majority have NO means except a contact at the other end of the radio circuit, NO way of insuring that their RF emitters meet the prescribed technical characteristics given in Part 97.

>In the vast >majority of situations, the radio amateur sets up his/her station
>and operates it without special formal training, testing or >certification other than the amateur radio license.

Yeah, they pay by plastic, perhaps follow the maker's instructions and fumble around until things sound right.

>So the >license tests must be more comprehensive than those for
>services where the "operator" is really more of a user.

Crap to the seventh order, Jimmie.

"Modern" amateur band transceivers, transmitters, receivers, etc.
are ready-to-play right out of the box. Those are aligned, tested, calibrated, ready-to-go. Sort of like the SGC 2020 private marine version SSB transceiver. :-)

>Typical amateur radio equipment - particularly HF/MF
>equipment - has many technical adjustments and controls.
>Skill and knowledge are required to operate such radios
>to best advantage.

Oh, back to lower-order CRAP, Jimmie. After an hour's instruction (maybe less) I was QSYing a BC-339 1 KW HF transmitter. It had MORE "technical adjustments and controls" than the average amateur transmitter of comparable power. Wanna see what those looke like? Here:

http://sujan.hallikainen.org/BroadcastHistory/uploads/My3Years.pdf

>Unlike almost all other radio services, amateur radio is

Except the "60m band."

Except for all those VHF and UHF repeaters which have been frequency-coordinated.

<snip of squealing to the chorus>

Yes. NO class, ONE license.

If you need gold stars or pretty certificates, get those at Office Depot.

What do you mean "occasionally operate?" And just what is YOUR experience at ham bands of 220 MHz and up? Especially right after WW2.

>Yet most >Technicians then and now are primarily communicators, not >builder/experimenters.

Funny thing about your sneer, Jimmie, it almost makes you smile,
but not quite.

Right now the combined numbers of no-code-Technician and Technician
Plus classes make up a bit more that 48% of ALL U.S. amateur radio licenses granted. Almost HALF, Jimmie.

Newcomers to amateur radio are entering through the no-code-test
Technician class level...because it has NO code test.

Sunnuvagun!

>Perhaps that emotional baggage is why you never >held a Novice license, Len. Perhaps you disliked being
>known as a beginner.

In 1951 I would have accepted that "Novice" grading...as a teenager. Maybe in early 1953 at age 20 when learning to operate high-power HF transmitters. NOT by late 1954 as an E-5 and supervisor of an operating team. Sure as hell NOT by early 1956 after being a supervisor of microwave radio relay equipment vital to the linkage of all parts of a military
radio station.

You call me a "beginner" in radio now you will get laughed at
and become a target for rotten tomatoes.

Get the picture?

<"history" lesson omitted from one who wasn't there then>

>Neither is it a reason to discard the concept. The details >may need changing but the concept is valid. It offers a way

More crap of no particular order.

You are stuck in an endless loop of repeating past regulatory standards AS IF time and attitudes have not changed. For example of blindness to actual fact:

>One big reason the Novice lost favor as the entry point
>for new hams was its lack of privileges on the most popular >VHF/UHF bands - 2 meters and 440, where most of the repeaters are.

Just ordinary crap. The Novice class started before "repeaters" were numerous in major urban areas.

After 1990, newcomers were shunning "Novice" and going for the NO-CODE-TEST Technician class license. Sure, it was straightjacketed to VHF and above but it was fun for most in urban areas and the equipment makers had equipment on the shelves for them to buy.

No, I've only touched on your apparent pedophilia.

Remarkable! You've made a DISCOVERY!

Ah, but you've talked only about their physicality. Mentally some NEVER outgrow their childhood...keeping the kiddie thoughts and pretending to be grown-ups long into their old age.

>One of the Basis and Purposes of the Amateur Radio Service

In case you haven't noticed, the FCC was NEVER chartered as an educational institution.

FCC say "SELF-education," Jimmie. About radio.

"Teach goegraphy?" What are public schools for? Recess?

"Other languages?" Morsemen say "morse code is an international language" therefore only ONE is needed.

"Time zones?" WTF you tawkin bout?

"Government regulations?" BWAAAAHAHAHAHAHAHAHHAAH!!!!!!

Part 97 is one of the SMALLEST Parts in Title 47 C.F.R.

>Amateur Radio is for people of almost any age, not >just "adults". It is not an age-specific activity.

I'm sure that pedophiles love it.

>Amateur radio is one place where adults

You've GOT to be kidding if you want to be "functional equals" with a six-year-old Technician!!!!

>Young people do not need to be isolated from adults

Note: Got word from Psychology Today magazine that your application as Editor-in-Chief has been revoked.
You really DO have to have a passing grade on Psych 101
to qualify.

Now you are contradicting yourself.

>Those who are involved in Scouting

Here's a hint, Sherlock. BOY scouts and GIRL scouts are/were purposely FOR children. They weren't intended for grown-ups. If you need to wear a uniform and be in the woods, try enlisting in the army...which you've never done.

>Most young people who play sports will never be able to

Are there professionals in radiosport?

>Most young people who learn a >musical instrument will never be able to be professional

You can't play music over the amateur bands.

>Most young people who perform in school plays
>will not become actors.

Yet some TRY to be actors (or salespeople) toward others, trying to impress others on their lofty abilities. :-)

>But amateur radio can be the path to a number of careers, like >engineering.

The MAJORITY of my contemporaries in electronics got into it WITHOUT first getting an amateur radio license.

>You all had at least a high school education, didn't you?

Wasn't required then. Even literacy wasn't a requirement!
There were special classes to teach English then but that required an extension of the service time to compensate.

>All had passed various aptitude tests to become signalmen, didn't >they?

No. The ONLY aptitude test given in regards to radio was a morse code cognition test given to all recruits. Steering of recruits in the military then was DEMAND-driven. One goes where one is told to go.

>You all went to microwave school, right?

No. Some went to Field Radio School, some went to teletypewriter school, a few went to inside-plant telephone school. We had a separate group for outside-plant telephone people...the "pole cats" who put up the poles for wire antennas and strung the wire.

>It wasn't like you and the others had no "radio-electronics"
>background at all, and had to start from scratch.

Tsk. Try NOT to TELL ME what I or any contemporaries were doing, Jimmie. You don't know dink about it.

Some DID start with no previous experience other than turning on a broadcast receiver. One was a chemist in his 3rd year of college (not quite old enough to escape the draft and too young to escape drafting by the Wehrmacht!). One was a farmer from Iowa. Others were from different occupations having nothing to do with radio or electronics.

>While you

One did, in fact, transfer out...didn't like all that electronics snit at Monmouth and asked to go into Infantry.

>So you had experienced people to supervise, teach and guide >everything you did, and make sure you did it right.

That's normal in the military. :-)

They didn't hold any hands or coddle lower ranks if that's what you mean...<guffaw!>

>You weren't on your own at all until the experienced people thought

Not entirely true. If ANY situation arose that required handling, it was handled as best as one could. That is ALSO true in ANY aspect of military experience.

>What you did was all according to set procedures that had >been worked out carefully by trained and experienced people,

Not entirely true. With experience, learning, paying attention, lower rankings become higher rankings and are thus considered "trained and experienced." :-)

>And you had all sorts of manuals, training materials, tools,
>parts and test equipment to do the job - right?

Not entirely true. But, it is useless to try to explain it to you since you have NO similar experience and NONE in that time frame.

What, to QSY a BC-339? A BC-340? An LD-T2? Simple task.
The PW-15 was a bit more difficult due to the large doubleshorting links for the final tank (15 KW conservative RF output, looked like it was built for three times that).
Piece of cake to anyone with a normal memory.

Memorizing new jargon was more "difficult", memorizing
new procedures on the order-wire teletypewriter were more "difficult," some with bad pitch would set up the Shift on the RTTY exciters to 425 cycles instead of the 850 cycles standard. Jimmie, I WAS THERE, YOU WERE NOT. I've explained all of it before. I have a nice photo essay on it that is a free download. Did you get it?

>> We all learned and did our tasks
>
>I'm sure you did - and there were incentives to do so!

What "incentives" did we have? Name them.

Do one's job well enough and one does NOT get demoted, does NOT get Company Punishment ("Captain's Mast" in the Navy), does NOT get shit details...although some military tasks ARE shit details for all.

Promotion in rank an "incentive?" IF there is an opening (not guaranteed) in the TO&E and one is evaluated to be a responsible type, MAYBE a promotion. Of course, such an "incentive" also requires an additional responsibility and, with that,
a whole new set of "gradings" on performance.

>Like what, Len? Compared to amateurs who have done
>things like building and operating complete EME stations
>on their own time, with only their own resources?

Describe YOUR "EME" station, Jimmie.

Military life is NOT a hobby, Jimmie. You don't understand that and it is useless to explain it to you.

>Now I'll tell you about my experience on "entering HF".

We've all heard that before in here...yawn.

It sounds JUST like some cute human-interest stories
published now and then in amateur radio publications.

<"priceless" ego-boo story snipped>

>A completely different environment than what you described for >yourself.

Yes. Big difference. I never considered myself "superior" to anyone except of lower rank (superiority was already pre-defined). While all what I've described was going on,
WE (the soldiers) ALSO had to undergo periodic training to keep up our warfighting skills. NONE of that was a HOBBY, Jimmie.

>All the military radios I've seen that are/were >meant to be used by "line outfits" were made as simple to operate >as possible. That paradigm goes all the way back to the WW2
>BC-611 "walkie talkie".

"Handie-talkie," Jimmie. The "walkie-talkie" was the SCR-300
(R/T being BC-1000). Both designed by MOTOROLA.

Tell us YOUR experiences WITH "line" outfits. How good can you do morse keying while rattling around IN a moving tank?

Why do you think that military radios SHOULD have lots of complicated controls with lots of time available for operators to play with knobs, dials, and switches?

Ever "wear" an AN/PRC-9? [or its cousins PRC-8, PRC-10?).
How about carrying an AN/PRC-25 or a PRC-77? How about an AN/PRC-104 or the SINCGARS AN/PRC-119? Ever enter the "hopset" on a 119? I have. As a civilian.

If you want knobs, dials, switches to play with, try the old post-WW2 USMC HF transmitter T-195 designed by Collins Radio.
First Jeep-mounted Autotune critter, first one with an automatic antenna tuner...and enormously INEFFICIENT in terms of DC power drain on the Jeep versus its RF power output.

I can rattle off dozens more but you won't accept any of those that haven't appeared in the Military Ring of the boatanchors afficionados.

>The environments are completely different, Len.

NO KIDDING?!? Amateur radio is a HOBBY. Military is all about WARFIGHTING, Jimmie.

>Most
>radio amateurs are essentially self-taught, in their spare >time, using their own resources. What they could learn >in a week or two of intense formal training might take a >month to a year of part-time self-study.

WTF is this "intense" formal training? Is there a whips and chains punisher in the classroom as "teachers' aide?"

YOU tell ME EXACTLY how much compensation I got for keeping up with the state-of-the-art in electronics (and radio, if you insist on making those two indestinguishable fields
"separate")...and how many "intense instruction classes"
I got during my civilian career? I can tell you exactly to both: ZERO.

Anyone who tries to apply themselves in anything MUST do a whole helluvalot of SELF-STUDY...for their work OR for their hobby. SELF-STUDY on one's own free time...at nights, during lunch, anywhere keeping their eyes open and being receptive to new things. If that means taking the trouble to go to seminars, take extension classes without credit on one's own wallet payments, then one does it...if they really, really want to know more...in a hobby OR in a career.

>More important, the only experience requirements for
>amateur licenses in the USA disappeared 30+ years ago.

BWAAAAHAHAHAHAHA!!!!!!!! Someone somewhere FINALLY figured out that amateur radio was a HOBBY way back then!

Gotta love the fantasy that the amateurs had way back,
being oh-so-important communications providers to the nation! :-) That fantasy still persists. :-(

>... But it's an uphill road with FCC because >the NPRM clearly states that FCC doesn't see it that way.

WHICH NPRM? FCC 05-143? You are getting mixed up on what their discussion-on-other-Petitions have versus their proposal to just end all morse code test requirements for an amateur radio license.

Hey, if you wanna have a big boo-hoo on "the FCC doesn't see YOUR way," then check the newspaper coupons at your local market. There may be a special on Kleenex or other tissues.

If you want some nice gold stars to paste on your Extra license, go down to Office Depot and buy them. Then you can explain to your friends and neighbors how so very good you are ("see the gold stars?") and they will all gush
all over you. [Kleenex will also absorb extra gushing]

Stay dry.

No, Steve, Len is definitely a senior citizen. He's way past retirement age.

Nobody's "forcing" Len to do any of those things. He's free to move if he doesn't like how the neighborhood has changed.

My point about the whole zoning thing is not that Len or his neighbors
did anything "wrong". The point is that they resisted a change that others
wanted, even though the people who wanted it told them it was "progress"
and would be a good thing for the future.

Yet Len heaps abuse on those who resist a change in the Amateur Radio Service rules, even though the people who want the change say it is "progress" and will be a good thing for the future.

As for the claim that those of us with licenses aren't affected by those changes in any significant way, note that those who already owned houses in Sun City aren't really affected by the zoning change of R to
in any really significant way.

Of course Len and his neighbors could have bought the land from the failed developer and thus protected themselves from future development.

Let's see...if the houses cost a half million, the land for each house might be worth a hundred thousand. That's only 4.4 million for 44 houses. Say 5 million with all the costs. Divided among how many neighbors?

The rest is easy:

1) The neighbors pitch in and buy the land, to be held by a corporation formed for the purpose.
2) Developers are invited to submit proposals for development.
3) When a developer comes up with a proposal that meets all the neighbors'
requirements, that developer is allowed to proceed, subject to a tight contract
that only turns over title to the land when all conditions are met.
4) Profit!

You haven't.

How about keeping abreast of correct spelling? ;-)

Right.

And if there were only one license, regardless of what it would be called, its test(s) would have to contain everything that is now contained in the three written tests for the Amateur Extra.
Otherwise the standards would be reduced.

So what you propose is that all new amateurs would have to pass the equivalent of all the written tests
for the Amateur Extra all at once, just to get an amateur radio license.

Is that what you want?

Roger likes women. At least he says so.
Except his are the kind you can touch, taste and feel.
Not cartoons like you prefer.

Problem is that all of Roger's 'women' are inflatable. Hey, Todd, maybe if you ask him nicely he might agree to send you a loaner. He has several.

Todd,

Romans 1
(New International Reader's Version)

24So God let them go. He allowed them to do what their sinful hearts wanted to. He let them commit sexual sins. They polluted one another's bodies by what they did.
25They chose a lie instead of God's truth. They worshiped and served created things. They didn't worship the Creator. But he must be praised forever. Amen.

26So God let them go. They were filled with shameful longings. Their women committed sexual acts that were not natural. 27In the same way, the men turned away from their natural love for women. They burned with sexual longing for each other. Men did shameful things with other men. They suffered in their bodies for all the twisted things they did.

28They didn't think it was important to know God. So God let them go. He allowed them to have dirty minds. They did things they shouldn't do.

As we all know ... AIDS kills fags !

Jimmie, you haven't gotten ONE THING right in this very NON-RADIO subject! Here's the correct chronology:

1. The residential area where I live was zoned ENTIRELY "R" standing for single-family residences prior to 1960 when the first development was started. A 15-acre parcel had been used for freeway base fill from the decomposed granite common in these Verdugo Hills; that parcel was also zoned
"R."

2. At the time I purchased my house in 1963, the residential area was half completed up to the next higher cross-street, that being completed in 1962. The 15-acre parcel remained vacant, undeveloped.

3. By 1973 the remainder of the residential area was fully developed, all the way to the top, all the way along Glenoaks Blvd save for one small open area to the still-undeveloped 15-acre parcel.

4. About 1988, a contractor-developer purchased the 15-acre parcel and tried various schemes to rearrange this parcel which had a maximum elevation difference of about 350 feet.
Well before that year the entire area was fully developed
and inhabited, the only easement being the Lutheran church now named "All Saints" at the intersection of Lanark and Glenoaks.

5. By 1989 the only possible way this first developer could make any profit at all was to build apartments. Zoning did not permit apartments so the Zoning Commission was told the developer he would have to sell the idea to the residents surrounding that parcel. The first developer tried, using community meetings at the church. The neighborhood association opposed that in no uncertain terms.

6. In 1990 the matter was brought up for public discussion at a Zoning Commission open meeting to change the Zoning from
"R" to "R1," the latter designation meaning residential but multi-family (apartment) structures. The developer presented his case. The neighborhood association presented theirs, pointing out that ALL plots surrounding this parcel were "R." The Zoning Board made some noises saying that the planned "senior citizen apartments" would be "beneficial to the community" (none of the Board members lived within 10 miles of this area and knew dink about it first-hand).

7. In the next ten years the first developer became a figure in bribery (guess who of) and he managed to sell it to a second development firm. NO "senior apartments" had been built but the first developer had been forced to annually clear the 15 acre parcel of dry brush per fire code. The second developer got a much better civil engineer and planned for a walled community of 44 two-story homes (upscale) with full drainage and streets and utilities underground. That plan was shown to the neighborhood association in late 2000 but got no admiration. The association could do nothing since that did not interfere with the ORIGINAL "R" zoning.

8. Earth moving began in early 2001 and continued for 9 months until the 44 plots could begin building. The amount of earth moved was somewhere between 220 and 250 thousand cubic yards. The average size of the plots was a quarter acre...most are smaller, only the "corner" lots being as large as a third acre. Sell price began at $500 thousand in 2001, highest being $800 thou. All were sold before building was completed.

>Yet Len heaps abuse on those who resist a change in the Amateur Radio >Service rules, even though the people who want the change say >it is "progress" and will be a good thing for the future.

Poor baby, got "abuse" dumped on you?

Jimmie, you ignorant little flyweight arguer, note the above.
Were there ever anything but RESIDENCES involved? No. At the time the first developer went for the zoning change, 400 acres of residences were ALREADY surrounding that empty parcel. Except for the church (off to one corner), COMPLETELY surrounding that unused for over 28 years parcel. What "progress" would 44 homes, all single-family units, have brought to an area ALREADY full of single-family residences filling 400 acres?

Those much-vaunted "senior citizen apartments" were never built.
The payola to convince the Zoning Commission members only enriched their pockets. The first developer went out of business.

>As for the claim that those of us with licenses aren't affected by those >changes in any significant way, note that those who already owned

>houses in Sun City aren't really affected by the zoning change of R to >R1 in any really significant way.

Dumbshit, I don't live in "Sun City, Arizona." Where I live is NOT some "retirement community." Home owner ages range from 30s (couple across the street from me) to 80s (uphill neighbor) to 50s (two houses below) to 40s (corner house two houses above me).

>Of course Len and his neighbors could have bought the land from the
>failed developer and thus protected themselves from future development.

Bullshit, ignorant slut. YOU could have gotten the story CORRECT instead of making up a poor verbal assassination attempt. You could have at least gotten the suburb NAME correct. My byline with full surface mail address has been in Ham Radio magazine enough times...as well as in the FCC ECFS.

Can't you get ANYTHING right?!?

There are NO restrictions on antenna structures in my neighborhood other than FAA regulations...it is a mile and a half from the closest part of BUR (Bob Hope Airport in Burbank). Two blocks uphill from me lives an amateur with an HF beam and some wire antennas...plus at least three other houses with CB verticals.
Many more satellite broadcast antennas here than ham or CB even though we have both analog and digital TV cable distribution.

Jimmie boy, you TALK a bit too big for not knowing a damn thing about the subject. I must admit it would have been fun to see you at an association meeting or Zoning Commission meeting talking FOR changing residence zoning from "R" to "R1" "in the name of PROGRESS!!!" I'll bet you would have run, cowering in fear of the irate association members, unable to stand up to grown ups who were living there FIRST!

BWAAAAAAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHHA!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!

Try, oh please TRY to understand that this newsgroup is about amateur radio policy, NOT residencial zoning laws.

But nobody ever built on it. Those 15 acres were vacant and open - undeveloped - right? Still zoned "R" but nobody built or lived there.

remain undeveloped and unchanged forever?

Nobody had built anything on it and nobody lived there.

Ah! Somebody else owned it, and that developer bought it - for money.
It became the developer's property, not yours and not your neighbors.
Yet you sought to tightly control what the developer could do with his 15 acres.

> Well before that year the entire area was fully developed
> and inhabited, the only easement being the Lutheran church now

But the area was not "fully developed and inhabited" if there was a 15 acre parcel with no residences on it!
>
> 5. By 1989 the only possible way this first developer could make

1989 was 16 years ago, Len.

More important - how was it that the only possible way the developer could make any money was to build apartments? Were housing prices so low that single-family homes or duplexes could not be built and sold?

Is there anything wrong with a developer making a profit by building homes
for people to live in?

> Zoning did not > permit apartments so the Zoning Commission was told the > developer he would have to sell the idea to the residents > surrounding that parcel.

"the Zoning Commission was told the developer"??? What the heck is that supposed to mean?

Did you mean:

'Existing zoning did not permit apartments so the Zoning Commission told the developer that he would have to sell the idea of a zoning change to the residents surrounding the 15 acre parcel.'

> The first developer tried, using > community meetings at the church.

So he was upfront and honest about what he wanted to do with the land that had lain undeveloped for so long.

> The neighborhood
> association opposed that in no uncertain terms.

Where did the neighborhood association come from? Was it pre-existing or was it created for the purpose of opposing that first developer?

And why was it even needed? Couldn't individual citizens deal directly with their government?

What percentage of the residents were dues-paying members of the neighborhood association? Was membership voluntary or mandatory?
>
> 6. In 1990 the matter was brought up for public discussion at 1990 was 15 years ago, Len.

> The developer

So you were trying to apply and retain the standards and practices of 1960 to the 15 acre parcel of 1990. You were resisting change, trying to keep things as they were when you came to the community. Everyone had to build their house the way yours was built (single family residences)
and that must never change. By law.

> The Zoning Board made some noises saying that > the planned "senior citizen apartments" would be "beneficial > to the community"

Progress! Change! The future, not the past! Yet you wanted the standards of 1960, not 1990. You wanted everyone to do it the way you did it, not some other way. IOW, NIMBY.

> (none of the Board members lived within > 10 miles of this area and knew dink about it first-hand).

So they were outsiders who were trying to impose change on you, without having "paid their dues" by being part of the community.

Kinda like people with no amateur radio license and little or no Morse Code experience trying to impose their will on those of us who are licensed and do use Morse Code.

None of the Zoning Commission folks lived in your area. None of the FCC Commissioners is a radio amateur or an engineer.

An outside nonresident developer tried to push change on those who lived there. An outside unlicensed retired-from-regular-hours gadfly (you) keeps trying to push change on amateur radio (not just Morse Code test elimination but other things like age limits and one license class).

The neighborhood association tried to present what its members wanted - just as the ARRL tries to present what its members want....

Pretty clear what the connection is!
>

"became a figure in bribery"??? That's a serious charge of criminal wrongdoing, Len. Do you have any evidence?

Was he indicted? Brought to trial? Found guilty?

> NO "senior apartments" had been built but

So you managed to hold back "progress" for a while.

> The second

So the new developer had to meet standards you didn't have to meet (are your utilities all underground?) Not because they were necessary to the functioning of the houses but because the neighbors had to be placated.

> That plan
> was shown to the neighborhood association in late 2000 but

> that did not interfere with the ORIGINAL "R" zoning.

So the second developer, even though he could have built apartments under the revised zoning, chose to build single-family homes instead.

So in a way the neighborhood association won and held back change!
The standards of 1960 were applied to 2000! But you're not still not happy!

So what? Is there any magic requirement or law of nature that says that parcel has to be like all the others around it? That its little boxes
on the hillside have to be like all the other little boxes on that hillside -
all made out of ticky-tacky and all looking just the same?

> What "progress" would 44 homes,

New people. New architecture. More tax revenue. More diversity.
Apartments would have brought even more, but you resisted them.

What "progress" will removing the Morse Code test bring to the HF/MF amateur radio bands?

What "progress" will reducing the number of license classes to just one bring to amateur radio?

What "progress" will rejecting young people bring to
amateur radio?

> Those much-vaunted "senior citizen apartments" were never built.

So, you won! Youshould be happy, but you sound miserable, because the new houses block your view.

What *are(you talking about, Len?

Was it impossible for the neighbors to have bought that 15 acre parcel?

400 acres of surrounding properties - maybe 800 homes - couldn't buy that 15 acre parcel? Why not?

That's where you're wrong, Len.

This summer I did major renovation work to my residence. Needed a variance to do some of it, and permits to do all of it. Went before the local Board and got everything I wanted in the variance, and all the permits. Plus the neighbors
are happy and supportive.

And I have my antennas.

Then why did you bring it up?

Fact is, you thought those 15 acres would be undeveloped forever. You thought you had some rights to keeping them as they always were.

And you were wrong.

But what really ticks you off is the realization that you are just like the developers you despise.

Such negativity. I'll gladly discuss amateur policy with either of you. What would you like to discuss?

Yes those black people are aren't they. Ooh you mean the white people?? yea. shocking they should complain about TNB. The thing is, acting as they do, these black "niggers" (as the statements go and also how other black people class their lower brothers) alienate themselves and its no wonder that most "racist claims" are dismissed as TNB so the real genuine cases of racism tend to make us just think "here we go again" rather than take the claims seriously. Remember the cry wolf story.
Some of the stories on that site put me off pick and mix or help yourself foods. Not simply because of the blacks behaving like animals but anyone with any disease could "play" with the food your about to pick up.... urgh..... mind you, seeing some of the staff in McDonalds and similar eateries puts me off their cuisine somewhat too. My god, if you knew some of the things that happens to your food before you get it you'd never eat again....

What is Ham Radio?

Ham Radio is a technical pursuit for those who are interested in the science of radio wave
propagation and who are also interested in the way that their radios function. It has a long-standing tradition of providing a source of engineers who
are born naturals.

Ham Radio awakens in its aficionados a whole-life
fascination with all things technical and gives
an all-abiding curiosity to improve one's scientific knowledge. It's a great swimming pool, please dive in!

This excitement causes a wish to share the experience
with ones fellow man, and shows itself in the gentlemanly traditions of Ham Radio.

Radio Hams are in a unique privileged position in that they can construct and operate their own equipment! No-one else has this privilege. Users, such as broadcasters,
the po lice and armed farces, CBers and mobile phone users have to purchase ready-made gear. Manufacturers
are not licensed to operate their gear. Radio Hams
are qualified to design, build and then operate their own pieces of equipment. They do this
with gusto, and also repair and modify their own
equipment. This is a privilege well worth the effort
to gain, and one to be jealously guarded.

The excitement that drives a Radio Ham starts with relatively simple technologies at first, perhaps making
his own Wimshurst machine and primary cells. Small pieces
of test equipment follow, possibly multimeters and signal generators. Then comes receivers and transmitters. It is with the latter that communication with like-minded technically motivated people takes off. The scope for technical development grows with the years
and now encompasses DSP and DDS. There is also a great deal of excitement in the areas of computer programming to
be learnt and applied.

The technical excitement motivates Radio Hams to compete
with each other to determine who has designed and manufactured

the best-quality station. This competitiveness is found in DXing, competitions and fox-hunts.

-----OOOOO----

However, beware! A Ham Radio licence is such a desirable thing to have that there are large numbers of people who wish to be thought of
as Radio Hams when, in fact, they are nothing of the kind! Usually such people are a variation of the CB Radio hobbyist; they buy their
radios off the shelf and send them back to be repaired; they are not interested in technical discussion
and sneer at those who are; they have no idea how
their radios work inside and have no wish to find out;
they are free with rather silly personal insults;
they have not satisfied any technical qualification
and their licences prevent the use of
self-designed-and-built equipment.

These CB types engage in the competitive activities
with their Cheque-Book-purchased off-the-shelf radios
in a forlorn effort to prove that they are Radio Hams.

No _REAL_ Radio Hams are deceived by such people!

-----ooooo-----

One infallible way to disambiguate the CB Radio Hobbyist
from the _REAL_ Radio Ham is to solicit their view of the difference between CB Radio and Ham Radio. A Radio Ham will perceive Ham Radio to be a technical pursuit and will perceive CB Radio to be a social communications facility
no different in essence to a land-line telephone or a GSM mobile in the hands of a 6-year-old. Thus a Radio Ham
could also hold a CB licence safe in the knowledge that such a licence says no more about him than having a land-line telephone, whilst continuing to regard Ham Radio as a separate technical pursuit.

A CB Radio hobbyist, on the other hand, sees no difference between a Ham Radio licence and a CB Radio licence. To him, they are sisters-under-the-skin. Wrongly, the CB Radio Hobbyist then
tries to classify himself as the equal of the Radio Ham when, in fact, he is nothing of the kind. A sure sign of a CB Radio hobbyist is if he holds, or has ever held, a licence
issued under the gangrenous degeneration that is the M3/CB Fools' Licence scheme.

-----ooooo-----

One group of people who claim to be of the standard of Radio Hams but who are in reality nothing more than an apology for the failure of a CBer are those class B licensees who falsely proclaimed that they were against the use of a Morse Test to control access to the HF bands, until, that is, a test was introduced at their intellectual level, the intellectual level of 6-year-olds.

6 year-olds simply lack the mathematical tool kit to enable them to handle even the simplest algebraic manipulation for Ohm's Law and thus, the disgraceful Class Ber's in the aforementioned category are not Radio Hams by any stretch of the imagination!

Remember - A sure sign of a CB Radio hobbyist is if he holds, or has ever held, a licence issued under the gangrenous degeneration that is the M3/CB Fools' Licence scheme!

I don't work in the lingerie business so I use the alternate form found in dictionaries.

But, you are trying to MISDIRECT again. Concentrate on WHY MUST ONE "UPGRADE" TO A "HIGHER" CLASS LICENSE?

To get a "higher class" license so that you can continue to look down on "lesser classes" with impunity?

To blindly follow the league's directives of "upgrading?"

logical thinking!

>And if there were only one license, regardless of >what it would be called, its test(s) would >have to contain everything that is now contained in >the three written tests for the Amateur Extra.

Oh, oh...right away you slipped off the logical path.

IF AND ONLY IF there were just ONE license (no classes), then the FCC would lay down DIFFERENT regulations for the written test. Following that, the VEC QPC would have to reorganize the single question pool to a new set of questions and answers.

The reason - which should be obvious to you but isn't - is that there would be NO differences between classes
so many of the questions of the old class (distinction)
system WOULD NOT APPLY.

>Otherwise the standards would be reduced.

No, no, no. You don't seem to understand. With only ONE license, there would be NO DIFFERENCES IN CLASSES
because there would NOT BE any classes.

That's a whole new paradigm. You can't conceive of that because you are completely enclosed in the conservative mental box of conventional thinking.

>So what you propose is that all new amateurs would >have to pass the equivalent of all the written tests
>for the Amateur Extra all at once, just to get an >amateur radio license.

I'm not "proposing" anything in regards to radio. :-)

The concept of ONE LICENSE existed in the beginning of United States amateur radio.

Internal amateur politics resulted in the piece-by-piece changes that peaked in the Byzantine six-class system existing before 2000 restructuring. You can try all sorts of sugar-coated spin on that to deny the amateur politics but that doesn't erase the obvious that it WAS politics within the "amateur community."

United States amateur radio evolved to an oligarchy, a
"one-party" amateur politics thing wherein major influence was contained in the ARRL and their ruling cadre of OTs who "knew what was 'best' for every amateur." The peak of that may have been reached in the late 1970s. There's been a very slow transition from that oligarchy (I hesitate to use dictatorship) due to CHANGES in freedom and ability to discuss NEW THINGS. A catalyst for that was the ubiquitous personal computer used for communications, first over BBSs and now the Internet...especially the Internet with every federal agency now having an Internet portal and responsive to the ordinary citizen.

"Tradition" can be used as a security blanket. Keeping the old ways of doing things intact is comforting, a known thing, certain. It can be a tremendous enhancement to the unfortunate tendency of many humans to proclaim themselves "better" than other humans through certain skills. That's just a basic survival instinct misapplied. There is no quantifiable limit on what humans can do if they cast off the misapplied tradition and try new concepts, ideas, give those a chance. Of course there's no guarantee that new things WILL work out better for all...but there's no guarantee that new things CANNOT be better. Those have to be tried out first but some open-minded reasoning can determine the probability of successs. Another word for that is PROGRESS. It is all around us in everyday life.

The ultra-conservative will balk at ANY change of their misapplied traditions. They are secure in their known concepts, take comfort in being believers; "it has always been that way and it will always be so" is a maxim of the ultra-conservative that fails repeatedly. Conservatism is basically a fear of the unknown, a maifestation of basic survival instincts. However, as abundantly proven in the progress of humankind, liberalism in some concepts can make for better survival, plus improvement for the entire group.

You've chosen to be an ultra-conservative believer in steadfastly holding to old concepts. You have met the old tests (originated by older men) and achieved a "position" and thus consider yourself a "superior" in one field of avocational activity. You wish to maintain all those old concepts because, if those were eliminated, you would not have the same "superior" status above others. That's a very selfish act, very anthropomorphic, when applied to an avocational group of over a half million spread all over the USA. That selfish minority view delays progress for the majority.

this isnt a matter of crimenal law. it is a matter of the provider's TOS which is a contract between the web sight and earthlink. I am very surprised that you dont know about TOS and how a provider can kick you off if you violate his TOS. sheeze.

An ISP is a private entity and does not have to allow it even if it is legal. When you sign up with an ISP, you are entering into a contract and agreeing to its terms and conditions. If the ISP says no hate speech, then they can legally pull the page or sight and even cancel the user's service due to violating the contract.

I have seen people proposing going entirely to voluntary band plans for HF instead of regulated splits ala Europe and thus making all modes legal throughout the entire band. That could impact your use of Morse during the larger voice contests. With the number of hams in this country that could be a mess.

I'm an enthusiastic user of CW, but I fully support such a plan. Let "market forces" and usage-centric gentlemens agreements determine band usage.

Morse users currently can use that mode on literally all the amateur-allocated frequencies with the exception of the five channels on 5Mhz. On a "larger" CW contest weekend they could (perfectly legally) use any frequency (that was not occupied) for CW contesting.

Why should CW be alone in such a generous allocation?

Jim, service men and women are instruments of National Policy. They face danger defending the Constitution of the United States. And many if not most wish that their civilian leaders would take the Constitution a little more seriously.

So when the going gets rough, are they free to quit and walk away? A lineman can. A policeman can. A fireman can.

When their spouses and children ask when are they going to come home,
and there is no answer?

What is wrong with you to suggest that it's even remotely the same?

Now there's someone to take advice from!

Jim, I'm sorry that you don't "get it." You don't get it because you "served in other ways." Like your constant harping on Len about professional radio not being the moral equivalent of amateur radio, your "serving in other ways" isn't even remotely equivalent to military service, even if you wished it were so. As it stands, you wouldn't know what to wish for even if that wish were granted.

Hans, I think that is 100% correct. I think that there's a wee little bit of spectrum at 220MHz where you can't use Morris Code. It's a legal mode everywhere else.

Couldn't possibly. CW always gets through.

Thus one of the original reasons to test for Morse. It limits the number of people holding a license.

It's not illegal - no law has been broken. It is simply against Earthlink's published guidelines. Mass market ISP's simply cannot afford the free market fallout from such politically incorrect hostings.

My name is Roger. I am an Amateur Radio Operator. I used to be a problematic type of person on the Ham bands and I was accused of jamming the transmissions of fellow Hams. I am innocent, innocent. I did nothing of the sort but one day I came home to find a letter from Riley Hollingsworth, an attorney representing the FCC. In the letter I was informed that I was under investigation for illegal operating practices according to the FCC rules and regulations. Riley told me to call him to discuss these accusations. I didn't.

Then along came other letters from Riley and I was told that I had to confirm my ability to remain a Ham by being tested again.

I did as directed and was able to keep my Amateur Radio license. Ever since those days I have been attacked by my fellow Hams. Some have even taken to calling me "2test".

I did nothing wrong. Never. Ever. I was chosen at random (my story) for a retest simply because I got my first license through a VEC. Besides, I was not Ordered to retest.it was an invitation from Mr. Hollingsworth to do so. I bet every one of you Hams know someone who had to retest for no reason other than they went through a VEC the first time.

There are lots of sources to see the letters that Riley sent me and I defy you to show me anywhere in those letters where I was accused of Malicious Interference. Prove it. It never happened because I didn't do it.

Yours truly.

Wodger the Dodger AB8MQ

PS: Run my call in Google and you will find 2,380 articles. Run my old callsign, KC8JBO in Google and you will find 295 references.

Here is a quote:

NOTE: Issuance by the FCC of a Warning Notice indicates that the FCC has what it believes to be reliable evidence of possible rules infractions and not necessarily that the recipient has violated FCC rules. The FCC has the authority, pursuant to ⍰97.519(d)(2) of the rules to readminister any examination element previously administered by a volunteer examiner. This Enforcement Log is representative of recent Warning Notices, Notices of Violation, calls for retesting, and other FCC communications to licensees involving possible serious rules violations. It is not a comprehensive listing of FCC Amateur enforcement actions.

GLENDALE, WV: The FCC sent a Warning Notice November 9, 1999, to General licensee Roger L. Wiseman, KC8JBO, citing evidence that the licensee had been "deliberately and maliciously interfering with the radio operations of other licensed amateurs" on 20 meters. "This interference has occurred at various times in the last several months and includes broadcasting music and other unidentified transmissions," said a letter from FCC Special Counsel for Amateur Radio Enforcement Riley Hollingsworth. Hollingsworth warned that continued operation of the type described could result in a fine or license revocation proceeding, and he requested that the licensee contact him to discuss the allegations.

Hello Dee.

As fate would have it, most times the isp couldn't care less about usenet.

Why can't we all do a bong as radio operators and report back? These cross-posted imaginary lines between bands and privileges turn into flames for the most part on the rec.radio circuit, reckon?

The no-code apartment dwellers' have drawn too much attention to themselves already it seems, and yet they cry for an easier entry to phone.

The whole ball -o- wax is slowly dying but that's another topic for the new year. At any rate, I've always respected your opinion so far, Dee.

They have dummied down the ham license so the venders like Icom can them away without difficulty and still carry on an uninterrupted QSO

Sorry but I completely disagree with you. There is absolutely nothing stopping anyone who wants to build and use their own kit or to talk about it or suchlike and to advance themselves in the field of radio communications. The interest in this part is just not there like it was in the past so if the licence conditions had not changed then Amateur would be dead in the water.
Making the exam technical to the extreme of sitting a practical exam and designing and building your own kit, and of course the other argument of Morse set at at least 25+ WPM wouldn't have encouraged more people into the Hobby, it would have killed it. You may disagree and be indignant of the new breed of Amateur and those who just use it to piss about would be using it anyhow, licence or not but you have to move on. The irresponsible users have been there for decades, not since the lowering of licence conditions.
Its like investing in a shoe shine business. Back in the 50's and 60's you would have had a thriving business... but times have changed.. shoes have changed... how many shoe shine businesses have survived? I don't know of any. They moved on, stayed in the same line of business and now sell shoes or "sneakers" rather than try to clean them. Things change and you have to move on.
Its easy to blame others for Amateurs "Decline" but there is still the top level licence for those with the interest to go all the way and there is nothing to stop experienced Amateurs to encourage and help their "underlings" develop as many do. Sitting back and moaning about how others have let it decline while doing nothing themselves to help the situation is pure laziness.
Another analogy is you don't have to pass an HGV licence and drive a huge truck just to drive on the roads (god bless the truckers ;o)

Graham

Then that's fine for you and your CW friends but is it really the top goal all Amateurs set out to achieve... to go dah dah dah dit dit dit dah dah dah? Don't you also enjoy talking to distance stations with your voice too?
I agree that the part of the spectrum allocated to Morse should be left for Morse and those who wish to use Morse should have a slightly different level of licence/callsign to acknowledge this but it seems its always but "always" levelled at us with any discussion about seemingly low licensed intermediates/M3's/general class that unless your an extra class/advanced you are some sort of trailer park scum. Not for one minute am I saying you say this but its the general impression most get from some "alleged" full licence holders in these newsgroups.

Well, thank you Mary Whitehouse.
Lets hope you also complain about the ethnic sites disrespecting white people. The thing is with niggermania.com although some of the language used is of a racist nature, most of the stories ring true to many of us who have lived in black areas which always seem to turn into ghetto's wherever they are. Racist view or general observation? Ill let the readers decide.

I knew of a spoof site that a girlfriend I once had made and the only defamatory thing on it was a single link to the BNP party which is a legitimate and legal party in the UK and the host deleted her website immediately for this. No warning or anything it was simply removed. That was a Yahoo Geocities site. I personally find that a disgusting attitude for them to take as it took her many weeks of hard work to make her site and they never even warned her first.
Free speech seems to only apply for the ethnic minorities.

Graham

Don't get caught up in the "spelling" wars. I noticed that my fingers had typed the wrong one just after I hit the send button.

Free speech has never meant that a person can say whatever they want, wherever they want, whenever they want. There are many laws defining what you can and cannot do. For example, I can stand on a public sidewalk (i.e. publicly owned properties) handing out flyers all I want to so long as I am not doing anything illegal. On the other hand, if I want to hand them out in the shopping center (i.e. privately owned, not paid for by tax dollars), I must have the permission of the shopping center owner/management. The subject of the flyers is irrelevant. Our tax dollars do not pay for the ISP and so as a private entity they can limit usage of their service.

A business can legally prevent its employees from handing out political material (campaign buttons, flyers, etc) on its premises. If they have such a policy (and this has been clearly published to its employees), they can fire an employee for doing so and it does not violate the employee's right to freedom of speech.

To really understand the First Amendment and what freedom of speech really means, one needs to study it in the context of history. It had been a common practice for governments and rulers to throw people in jail simply for criticizing the government or even simply disagreeing with its policies. The First Amendment was crafted to protect people from being jailed for such and to enable and even encourage open discussion and debate on issues. It was not intended to protect libel, slander, fraud, speech encouraging violence, etc. Nor was it intended to force people to listen to someone else's free speech. If someone comes on my lawn and starts making a speech, I can call the police and have him escorted off. Freedom of speech does not allow him to force me to listen or to use my property.

The extent to which freedom of speech applies is endlessly debated and the amendment endlessly interpreted. All that people can really agree on is that it was not intended to allow an "anything goes" type of approach. They cannot agree on what it does cover however.

Correct! The First Amendment does not cover anything a private person or a private company does. It applies only to actions by the government.

That obviously eliminates any restrictions an ISP might put into their usage agreements from "breaching the First Amendment. I'm always amazed at the number of people who don't understand the Bill of Rights. Walt must have been asleep in the back of the room when his teacher talked about the Constitution.

Walt's in the UK. I seriously doubt if they teach the US Constitution there. They may do a brief outline just as we get a brief summary of Britain's form of government but it's unlikely they would go into any depth on it.

Oh right, you lied about flushing me.... then you act childish..

I make a perfectly valid point in reply to a posting of yours and you immediately come back with a childish reply as I don't agree with you. This just goes to show the level of person you are. You bleat on about the decline of Amateur radio blasting the authorities that be then, when someone doesn't massage your ego in their reply, you lose control and act like this.

No need to go on is there really.

Anyone talks about US Constitutional free speech without knowing

Horizontal effect of constitutionally guaranteed rights is an element of many countries' legal systems. When I studied a bit of law in Ireland, I learned about constitutional torts. The idea is that, take free speach, if torts law does not protect my right to free speach when it should, than this is a shortcoming on the part of the state, i.e. the court and the legislature. To rectify this, the plaintiff, when suing another private person in tort, can base his case on his constitutional right. In tort, there are about a dozen or so precedents where this reasoning was upheld.
In my own country, the Netherlands, the constitutionally protected rights do not have horizontal effect directly, but they are used for the interpretation of open norms in civil law, such as the public order exception to free contracting and the due care requirement in tort law.

I hope you learned something,

Except that I'm in the USA so I have nothing to worry about.

The UK is pathetic. Though I'm descended from Brits, I realize why my country declared independence. America may have its problems, but I expect that British culture will be extinct within a century, having first been turned into an joyless Orwellian police state before finally collapsing into anarchy.

"He did not know how long she had been looking at him, but perhaps for as much as five minutes, and it was possible that his features had not been perfectly under control. It was terribly dangerous to let your thoughts wander when you were in any public place or within range of a telescreen. The smallest thing could give you away. A nervous tic, an unconscious look of anxiety, a habit of muttering to yourself - anything that carried with it the suggestion of abnormality, of having something to hide. In any case, to wear an improper expression on your face (to look incredulous when a victory was announced, for example) was itself a punishable offense. There was even a word for it in Newspeak:
'facecrime,' it was called."

...the sun sets on the Tomb of the Unknown Solder as a solitary figure in a patch-adorned flight suit slowly paces out his lonely path of anger, J-38 in one hand, bayonetted surplus USMC soldering iron in the other. Pre-recorded marine marches softly fill the air, interspersed with beepings of a few PCTA morsebirds not yet extinct. The Tomb of the Unknown Solder is a lonely place, deep in the Wannabe Valley, full of neuroses, anger, and frustration. The single sentinel counts cadennce to himself, muttering "flux you, flux you" between the slow steps. His fists are clenched, eager to do bottle but only sipping a cup of unkindness. Sadly the sentinel at the Tomb of the Unknown Solder keeps going. There is no rosin for what he does and that is the tragedy. The sun slowly sets on the Tomb of the Unknown Solder leaving only the red light of fire in the eyes of the muttering sentinel. Those glow in the dark like demon pilot lights. Hatred lives on in his twilight of despair.

Id say you had quite a lot to worry about. Maybe not in respect of the content of your website (if it is yours of course) unless some of these black people get ahold of you of course, but everything else, gun crime, immigration, corruption... its all there in much larger amounts than in the UK.

> The UK is pathetic. Though I'm descended from Brits, I realize why my

Your Country is becoming a cess-pit of multi culteral misfit lowlifes. Declairing independance from the UK can only benefit the UK so I wouldnt get too excited about that. The website shows that only too well.

America may have its problems, but I > expect that British culture will be extinct within a century, having

Anarchy you say? Like the NO saga and the ghettos in nearly every City in your Country you seem to forget about. The UK is a reasonably tolerant Country as far as Immigration and integration goes but the USA.... I honestly believe the UK is in a much stronger position in holding onto its identity than the US.
That said my sympaties go out to the genuine American people having to put up with this.

A George Orwell fan.... that explains the previous barmy statement. So many people seem to be convinced they are being filmed and watched by some organisation to bring them down or fit them up with some crime. As if anyone in reality gives two hoots about them or anything they do.... too full of their own importance which is realistically rated at 0 to such organisations if, infact, they actually exist. George Orwell.. hah...

It depends whether you are attempting to gain by deception I would say on that account. Pop stars always use alias's, like Harry Webb. Come to think of it, Shirley Crabtree too as his known name was Big Daddy. So many people in different walks of life go by different names these days.

Its definitely a crime to spell Walt as Wlat though ;o)

Look up your very own new thread with "160 messages" in the subject.

> And WHEN have I EVER spammed this NG like you brother has?

That someone else has out-assholed you is not the point. You set the criterion at 160 new threads as internet stalking.

Now do you want me to attempt to count the new threads you've started about Mark?

...the new threads that you've started about Tod?

...the new threads that you've started about Len?

...the new threads that you've started about Cutie Boy?

...the new threads that you've started about me?

I'm thinking that's five (5) counts of internet stalking, by your definition.

>>>OR<<< you just might want to back off on the claim that Mark is "internet-stalking" you,
you disreputable internet skunk..

It's funny. A few years ago, I was surrounded by people serving in the military, and it almost appeared that everyone did. Most of us had been to the desert, to Honduras, to Korea, etc, etc, etc.

Now that I'm out here with the "civils," its eye-opening and shocking.

If Jim want's to make some legitimate claim to how he served, then he can make it. If not then he can go to his grave regretting how he misspent his youth or how he "served in other ways" that are the equivalent of military service in his mind. Sad.

Not a troll at all, Brian. I think it's a fair question.

Morse is allowed on virtually >>all<< amateur frequencies except 219MHz and 5MHz allocations.

Being a CW operator, quite frankly I'm happy about the flexibility that gives me. But it's a mystery to me why all modes aren't treated in this generous manner, and why other CW operators seem so firmly opposed to the Canadian/European "market forces" model of frequency sharing.

Nope. I did not write that I "served in other ways" on that date.

Nope, nope, and nope again. I did not write that I "served in other ways" on any of those dates either.

Len, if you had actually read what I wrote on those days, you'd know that.

What I have written is a question for you and others.

Here it is again:

Is service in the military the only way a citizen can serve our country? Or are there other ways?

Has to do with the compatibility of modes, Hans. Not all modes share bandspace equally well. Not all operators follow the bandplans, either.

>From what I read, the folks in Region 1 are already beginning to notice problems being caused by the "market forces" (loudest signal wins) model of frequency "sharing". A lot of Region 1 hams aren't so happy with how it's working out in real life.

One reason for the separation of 'phone and Morse/digital is to maximize the utilization of the available bandwidth.

Say you have a band like 80/75 meters. 500 kHz of bandspace.

If we allow 2.5 kHz for each SSB QSO and 250 Hz for each CW/digital QSO, (average)
it's clear that the band could theoretically support 200 simultaneous SSB QSOs or 2000 simultaneous CW/digital QSOs. Allowing all modes everywhere rewards
the modes that use the most bandwidth at the expense of those that use the least.

Perhaps the biggest fear many have is the "one way" nature of a lot of FCC rules changes. Suppose we do go to "all bands everywhere/voluntary bandplans"
and the result is a messy nightmare of QRM. Will FCC reimpose the old rules?
Very doubtful, given the history of the past 20-30 years.

That's a non-sequiter, Jim.

That's why there are bandplans. IARU has been in the bandplanning business mostly everywhere except in the USA for about 75 years. As new modes gain favor (market dynamics change) they reach agreement in their bandplans to accomodate the proportions of users of the various modes.

> Not all operators follow the bandplans, either.

Really? Well then I guess Riley will just have to invoke the "good amateur practice" rule..... oh, never mind, he's already doing that. Not good enough for you..... OK, add a new sentence to &#65533;97.101(a) so it reads as follows:

(a) In all respects not specifically covered by FCC Rules each amateur station must be operated in accordance with good engineering and good amateur practice. Nonconformance with IARU bandplan guidance is specifically considered a violation of this paragraph.

"Already"? After 75 years?

How many is "a lot"? 50? 50,000?

Be careful what you wish for. Using that logic, it follows that fair frequency management techniques would allow for an equal number of CW and Phone contacts since the number of regular users is about equal, and CW would lose some man-sized chunks of spectrum. The theoretical "even number" division of this 500kHz band would work out to 90 CW (250 Hz) and 90 SSB (2500 Hz) QSO's.

The CW allocation would be 3500-3522.5kHz, and SSB would have the remainder of the band. Sorry, but I can't live with that! Neither should we live with the current plan where CW has a theoretical 2000-QSO band, and SSB is limited to a theoretical limit of just 100 QSO's on that same band. If the number of CW users is roughly equal to the number of SSB users, why does CW now enjoy a 20-1 advantage in effective frequency space (measured in simultaneous QSO's)?

A Legal Alternative for 11 Meter Ops.

I thought I'd include this since so many of you choose to make derogatory remarks about CBer's rather than stick to the topic. (Code vs. No-Code, Restructuring, etc...) I personally like the code but you guys use the issue to take cheap shots at 11m ops. You should realize that many 11m ops visit these forums seeking to learn about ham radio, NOT be insulted. 73.

Hello fellow 11 meter enthusiasts,

I have a new idea. So much has been made of the fact that we (11m ops) have no real representation in DC while the amateur community has the ARRL. The USCBOA was a nice idea but seems to lack the organizational skills to get airborne. I got this idea while reading a ham forum thread where many amateurs were complaining about the ARRL allowing "chicken banders" to infiltrate the ham bands and vowing to cancel their membership. Well, here it goes.

JOIN THE ARRL! That's right; make them live up to their name. The AMERICAN (NOT Amateur ONLY) Radio Relay League. In the mid 60's, the number of CBer's outgrew the number of licensed amateurs. The price is $39.00/yr. and you need NOT be a licensed amateur to become a FULL member. You DO, however, need to be licensed for voting privileges though. I know that $39.00 is steep, but I've spent more on a power mic and this money REALLY does makes my voice louder. The 35 multiple choice Technician exam takes approx. 5 minutes to complete and the practice exams can be found on www.qrz.com as well as other popular ham sites. I'm sure there would be a bit of resistance in the beginning but the ARRL is made up of hams who are basically...politicians. That's right folks, let the first official lose "a close one" at the hands of an 11 meter "swing vote," and see how our "concerns" take on a little more importance. Here's a bonus, when you hear an old stodger cry "I'm canceling my membership," rejoice...that's called a two-for-one sale. Your vote no longer opposes theirs, it REPLACES it.

The kicker is that if you plan to be as vocal as I am, you need to run legal. I'm NOT preaching. I freebanded for over 10 years and LOVED it. However I send letters to my representatives and the FCC, so my house must be in order. Riley Hollingsworth himself can come to my QTH for a surprise visit. I sent a letter to my reps re. RM-9807 and asked why the FCC admitted that the MAJORITY of CBer's were in favor of dropping the 155 mi. limit rule, yet the ruling was swayed by "private interests," namely the ARRL and NAB. Not only did I receive a reply, but it included a reply from the FCC to an inquiry by my rep. Did it really make a difference?... maybe, maybe not, but I know at least three more souls know about this "voter's" displeasure. (An election year to boot!)

I sent a letter to Radio Shack (Tandy) in Fort Worth, TX re. their HTX-10 and its inability to be modified at their (RS's) request. I explained that there are some who may want the capability to "monitor" (;-P) the 11 meter band as well. I returned mine and told them that I would gladly pay the extra $50.00 to RF Ltd. for their Magnum 257(the modifiable version of the same rig) and will now purchase all my ham study material and 2m h/t elsewhere due to their policy. Again, did it make a difference...perhaps not, but at least they know that they've lost approx. $450.00 in sales plus restocking costs.

Remember, to be this vocal, you need to fly right. I miss freebanding and it gave me many many hours of pleasure over a ten year period, this is the best way I can give back to 11 meters. If you don't plan to quit freebanding, don't be too vocal and run a "common sense" set-up. Your ARRL vote still counts! I never ran amplifiers and worked the world with a Clear Channel Ranger AR-3500 (30 watt model) and a two element yagi. I also successfully encouraged many of fellow 11m ops to do the same. (Tech license, ARRL membership, & write reps.) It kills me when I hear hams flame us and there's little we can do because we don't want to attract the unwanted attention. Well, sometimes you have to defend yourself with the weapons the opposition gives you. The ARRL rates recently went up, you should hear the hams crying and threatening to cancel...go for it I say!

Instead, new hams would just have to pass all the exams at once just to get started. Unless you want to lower the written test requirements even more.

Yes. Amateur radio licenses are earned by passing the required tests. You haven't earned one, therefore you are neither qualified nor authorized to operate an amateur radio station.

Sure. But you haven't earned any amateur radio license, Len....

The time of one-amateur-radio-license-class ended
more than 70 years ago, Len. Why do you live in the past?

In fact, in the beginning there were no radio licenses at all.
That didn't work out so well.

That's partly true. Licenses are also required because the USA has entered into treaty agreements with other countries regarding radio regulation - including amateur radio regulation.

Do you think amateur radio should not require licenses at all?

You don't have an amateur radio license, Len. No achievement there!

Nobody says it is.

The complexity of the task of operating a radio transmitter is directly related to the transmitter. Some are designed to be very easy to operate, others are more complex.

> If very ordinary young men can operate multi-control
> vacuum tube transmitters of high power output with

No, it isn't.

You're taking the experience of a few people and a few transmitters and demanding that it apply to everyone and all transmitters. That's just nonsense.

Besides, you've already contradicted yourself. The "very ordinary young men"
all had some form of technical training, and had been selected for the task.

The transmitters they adjusted were already set up, operating, and the procedures to use them completely worked out. Those "very ordinary young men" all had more-experienced supervision to teach them the tasks and make sure they did it right.

And yet it took days of on-the-job instruction before they could be left to do the job on their own! Even then, the more-experienced supervision was always on-call if a problem arose.

Len, you don't seem to be able to understand the concept of "amateur radio station", let alone "operating".

Not operating in the amateur radio sense. Using.

You mean cell phones? FRS/GMRS radios? CB sets? Sure, they are - and those sets are specifically designed to require little or no training, skill or technical knowledge to use. Their functioning is almost totally automated, channelized, and centrally organized.

Show the posting where I wrote that, Len. I don't think you

Yes, it does. Those operators have skills that you do not have, and I think that bothers the heck out of you.

> Is 5 WPM rate

Yes! It's a very basic level of skill - entry level - but a skill nonetheless. The person who can do Morse Code at 5 wpm has skills that others do not.

> Geez, Jimmie, you've

And that's true - 20 wpm Morse Code isn't really that fast compared to what really good Morse Code operators do.

How?

It seems to really bother you that I'm better than you
at Morse Code.

Deride? How? I'm one of those "old extras". You're not.

So? It's a test of Morse Code skill at a very basic level. Entry-level, nothing more. It nevertheless requires that the operator have the skills.

Not delete - waive.

> If you've looked at the ARRL home page lately you > would have seen a little Quiz box. 45.6 percent of

Look again. And tell the whole story:

Percent of operating time spent using Morse Code:

76-100% 26.5 % (1149)
51-75% 7.2 % (313)
26-50% 6.3 % (274)

Less than 25% 15.8 % (684)
I do not operate CW at all 44.1 % (1911)
Total votes: 4331

So 44.1% don't use Morse Code at all, while:

55.9% do use it, at least some of the time,
40.1% use it for more than 25% of their operating,
33.7% use it for more than half of their operating

Etc.

Of course the poll itself notes that it is not scientific. Anyone can vote in it, including those who do not or cannot operate an amateur radio station at all. Plus it does not specify "HF" operating.

Radar isn't for communications. And the SGC2020 is dirt simple compared to most amateur radio HF transceivers - even the Southgate series are much more complex to operate.

The regulations were changed so that radios which did not require technical adjustment would be used, and so the need for radio licenses could be included in the pilot's license. Simple.

Ships still required radio operators into the 1990s, Len.

And the same is true for amateur radio. For example, in amateur radio the station transmitting always gives their own callsign last.

"K4YZ, this is N2EY" is correct.
"N2EY to K4YZ" is not.

Is there something wrong with using a credit/debit card?

Or following manufacturer's instructions?

Besides - it's something you haven't done.

There are more than a few of us radio amateurs who design and build our own amateur stations. You haven't done any of that, Len, yet you pass judgement on us as if you are somehow superior.

So what? You didn't buy it, build it, or install it. You just followed the instructions passed to you by the experienced people in charge.

Some might say your behavior was closer to "monkey-see, monkey-do"...

Most of them, anyway. Every month FCC issues a few dozen new licenses to Generals and Extras "right out of the box".

And for more than 5-1/2 years, the only choice new hams have had for their first license class is the Technician, General, or Extra.

The Technician also has the easiest and simplest written test - just 35

Certainly to anyone who disagrees with you.

I dunno - never tried. Better than you can, I bet!

I don't! The point is they're intentionally simplified - that's good!

So what? Do you think that somehow qualifies you to operate an amateur radio station? It doesn't.

The microwave school you went to, Len. How many hours a day/week? For how many months? All paid for by the taxpayers, right?

It's not my problem if you picked your employers poorly, Len.
Good employers see the value in training their people.

And the compensation you did get was continued employment.
That's the way it works!

Gosh, Len, you just figure that out? I was onto that 33 years ago.

I went to college mostly on my own money, Len. Earned an academic scholarship and kept it for four years. Got an educational loan and paid it all back on time with interest.
Paid for the rest out of earnings at various jobs I held all through undergraduate school.

Try working 35-38 hours a week, taking 5 engineering
courses (one of them at the graduate level) per term, and getting everywhere without a car (home, job and work were all separated by several miles).

Then there was grad school, after I'd been out of college for a decade. Full time plus work, school at night, etc.
At least I had a car....

Now about your one-class-of-license idea:

Suppose FCC actually went for that one. (They've turned down the idea and others like it more than once, but put that aside for a moment).

How would your one-license system work?
What would be the written test requirements?

Most of all, what would happen to the existing license classes? Would everyone just get full privileges?

Agreed. Jimmie MUST have quotes that are EXACT and WORD-FOR-WORD. Amazing. He can't understand that other people read the entirety of his boasting claims of doing more than others and doing it oh-so-much-better.

At the very same time he tries to dump on everyone who disagrees with HIM, be they veterans or not. "Patriotism?" Hardly.

Neither is Jimmie.

Maddie WAS Secretary of State at one time, though. Wonder if Jimmie could wear a nice dress and heels as Condi's replacement?

Brian, any quote attributed to him MUST be WORD-FOR-WORD or
"he never said any such thing."

He changes his boundary conditions to put himself in the "right"
anywhichwayhecan.

I understand. Been there, done that. Of course, I did it far further back than most, but I never forgot it.

A great problem with these "civils" is that, not being anywhere close to danger themselves, everything military is like a movie or TV show. All the actors come alive after the show is over and go on to play other parts in other shows later. Ain't so in the military. Once dead, completely dead. No SAG or SEG rules about resurrection for them. The military's environment is not a comfortable living room or an air conditioned theater.

Jimmie said "I was 'safe' in Tokyo." The Russkies "couldn't reach us with aircraft" or some dumb thing like that. Had he seen some rather elaborate plans for shelters and op-orders on what to do when the crap entered the cyclone, he would have probably complained about excess spending or equivalent. In the 1950s the Russkies DID have various delivery systems for special weapons. Jimmie doesn't want to believe that. Being safe in his crib in the yew-knighted-states, nobody was going to nuke HIM! :-) Ergo, nobody was going to nuke anyone. He went out of his way trying to barf on those of us who were OUT THERE one helluvalot closer to danger than HE ever was.

Be that as it may, most of the vets I've talked to who served off-shore were both cognizant of danger close-at-hand but also optimistic as to their survival. The vast majority of us survived and came back to the "civils," uncivil though some of them were.

My outfit did communications. We did it well, got two Presidential Unit Citations for it while I was there. We did communications of the most direct means possible then, didn't play at it as some amateur did with the "NTS" and their "official radiograms." At the same time we had to keep up with ordinary soldiering skills, summed up by the primary mission phrase "...to close with, and destroy, the enemy."

I like to think that the guys in my outfit could, if needs be, carry out their primary mission as soldiers. None of us wanted any "test" of whether or not we were. I thank God there wasn't any. Braggarts and hero-wannabes say the opposite, that they could/did "fight" anyone (with the jaw-bone of an ass...their own). See hero of seven hostile actions, Dudly the Imposter.

Hmphhh...the O-clubs still need waiters. Burger King still needs servers.

>equivalent of military service in his mind. Sad.

He knows no better. He will never allow himself to be with fault. Ergo, he is always right...others are always "wrong" if they disagree with him.

Lately, Jimmie has become an "expert" on regional real estate and urban zoning. He "knows exactly" all about every situation involving those two areas. He made some weird analogies to opinions I've expressed, analogies that have NO relationship whatsoever. That was all geared to make me look "bad," essential to make him "look good" and be without fault. It didn't work, was incorrect...but Jimmie thinks it did and Jimmie is the only one that counts. <shrug>

Aw, c'mon, Walt. We all know there are a lot of black people that genuinely don't deserve to be denigrated in any way. But then again, there are a lot that - simply by the way they act - do and this site does a screamingly funny job of it - only to that particular sub-group whom we've all encountered, mind, whether we choose to admit it or not..

We're just a few leagues ahead of you in the sewer pipe of political

I don't think it's so much that; it's more that American history is just too short to be worth teaching (certainly by European standards).

I -have- made amends, Dud -- by losing rank and pay, and (ironically) by doing time in the brig (not 'jail'). Even before I had my discharge upgraded, my "general under honorable conditions" was prima facie that I had fulfilled my duties and that I owe them nothing more. The only person who has -any- problem with my service is you. But never having served in the Corps yourself, your opinion means squat.

However, I will rephrase my comment:

Put up or shut up, Yellow Dog.

I see a reference to current standards of Usenet and Internet community, and since anything goes on the Internet, it niggermania.com is not in violation of TOS. How exactly did this website "disrupt" this newsgroup?

But I don't care what they don't like, ISPs are a dime a dozen and I can easily find another one. Actually, I'm inclined to subscribe to Altopia, they fiercely protect their customer's identities and really have no TOS other than turning over customer records if subpoenaed by an American court. Threatening to kill people is a crime and would qualify, but offending people is perfectly legal under U.S. law.

I think I see your point: America defeats Britain in the Revolutionary War. America defeats Britain in the War of 1812. America pulls Britain's fat from the fire in WWI. America pulls Britain's fat from the fire in WWII.

Post WWII finds the British Empire in eclipse. Six out for twenty-two overs, Toad-in-a-hole and Bob's your uncle. Is that about it?

What I wonder is the legality of that 1894 book "Ten Little Niggers" on the site. If "hate speech" is ever criminalized in the USA, does that mean all historical literature must be destroyed to comply with the law? Keep in mind that schools have banned books by Mark Twain because he uses the word nigger, but in a historical perspective his use is not racist because that simply was the word used at the time.

Take "negro," for instance. We still have "United Negro College Fund" and I think they recently opened a hall of fame for the "Negro League" of baseball that operated in the first half of the 20th century before sports were integrated. The word had no derogatory connotation then, but today it is considered a racial slur as vile as "nigger." Even the "Afro-American" they insisted replace negro is now taboo and we are told we must call them "African-Americans." In a few years that term will be forbidden, it will be considered racist to even mention their race and that they are simply "Americans."

So when hate speech is outlawed, will all books written prior to the new era of enlightenment be burned? You mention Orwell, so I imagine history will be "rectified" to purge it of all things unorthodox.

Here's a relevant quote. The working title for the movie "Brazil" was "1984 1/2" so I suppose the Manifesto could be "1984 3/4":

"When someone interprets as derogatory almost anything that is said about him (or about groups with whom he identifies) we conclude that he has inferiority feelings or low self-esteem. This tendency is pronounced among minority rights advocates, whether or not they belong to the minority groups whose rights they defend. They are hypersensitive about the words used to designate minorities. The terms 'negro,' 'oriental,' 'handicapped' or 'chick' for an African, an Asian, a disabled person or a woman originally had no derogatory connotation. 'Broad' and 'chick' were merely the feminine equivalents of 'guy,' 'dude' or 'fellow.' The negative connotations have been attached to these terms by the activists themselves."

What is "offensive"? Describe it. According to the hand-wringing Liberals, "offensive" is anything that they, in their elitist mindset, disagree with and deem to be politically incorrect. Enter the Thought Police.
And, for instance, when one or more of us stands up to the PC crowd we are labeled as Right Wingers or, in their weak PC minds, as RightWing Religious Nuts.
Oddly enough these Liberals are all about censorship.
I love it when some limp-wristed whiner comes along and mewls, "I find that offensive." So what? Big fuc*ing deal! Who is he/she to determine what the rest of us can or cannot say or even feel?
To date I have found nary a word in our Constitution that has anything to do with protecting crybabies from being offended.
And as far as the web site in question goes, one need only not go there. Or is that concept too simple for the Thought Police to grasp ?

Its not that Liberals are stupid. Its just that they know so much that isn't so.

Well you're obviously talking about the BBC and I thoroughly agree with your trenchant observations. However, it appears the attempted brainwashing has failed, as recent surveys have shown that today's children are actually less tolerant of other races than they were 20 years ago. Perhaps it's a backlash against the overtly obvious
'dysfunctionality is normal' propaganda spewed out by the Corporation (at public expense, of course).

America came into the war when it was all but won and 3 years after it started. Its troops played only a minor but crucial role. America saw the potential for profit and a chance to increase its sphere of influence for little effort, Britain on the other hand went to war in defence of its allies.

Once again America enters the war late and only for profit. Britain entered the war yet again in defence of its Allies. America was the only country to end the war richer than when it started.

Indeed. Two world wars cost Britain an Empire.

No its about the dollar pure and simple. Why don't you go and research how many wars of aggression America has waged? Name me one time America has gone to war in defence of its allies please.

And as someone who lives in Northern Ireland I'd like to thank all you Americans for financing decades of terror in my country, in particular I'd like to thank the NYPD and the NYFD who openly financed and supported the IRA. Boy didn't they just love it when it became their turn to suffer at the hands of murderers?

I believe Walt's right. History has shown it to be the case. The only Supposedly, anyway. One problem with IARU bandplans is that the

If you look at it that way, maybe.

OTOH, that approach rewards those who use the most spectrum, rather than those who use the spectrum the most efficiently.

> The theoretical "even number" division of this

Which means only 180 QSOs in the entire 500 kHz. And where do the digital folks
go?

Why not? You're the one pushing "market forces", Hans. What will you do when the bandplan says that's what CW gets?

Agreed! But simply tossing out the regulations isn't the answer.

> If the number of CW > users is roughly equal to the number of SSB users, why does CW now enjoy a 20-1 > advantage in effective frequency space (measured in simultaneous QSO's)?

Old rules, old ideas. I see no mention of digital.

The future is probably going to be very different. For one thing, we will soon have many hams on HF who don't know any Morse Code at all. We also have, already, a growing number using an increasing variety of "digital" modes which cannot be decoded without special equipment (usually a computer) and where the operator looks at a visual display rather than listening to the band. There are also "semi-automatic" and "robot" digital stations with no operator at all.

How does a Morse Code station, or an SSB station, tell a digital station that the digital station is causing interference - or even identify the callsign of the digital station? That's just one problem.

The widening variety of modes and operating methods means we need more rules, not less (unfortunately). I suggest that the bands be carved up into subbands-by-mode - CW only, narrow digital, wide/auto digital, analog voice. The ARRL "subbands by bandwidth" proposal tries to address the problem but it's got too many flaws.

I would say its more the perception that these minority groups seem to get more help in many cases to their indiginous white counterparts and they have this "racial discrimination" cry at them whenever whites repremand or disagree or voice their own opinion. This rarely used to happen 20 years ago and we all just got on with it. Nowadays though youngsters and many adults are fed up with being branded Racist by liberal do gooders and are sick and tired of being put second place abouve these immigrants/non-indiginous groups. You can only take so much before you (white people) feel you are the second class citizen and have to bow to their beliefs and religions otherwise your branded racist or bigoted.
Then theres the black gangs and the intimidation felt by many which was also hardly heard of 20 years ago. Also, as said by Enoch Powell many years ago, forcing different cultures to live with one another will eventually lead to rivers of blood frowing in the streets. Of course he was branded a screaming Racist but much of what he warned of is there.

Lets hope so...

Bodies like the Commission for Racial Equality will ultimately > be the authors of their own downfall. These things, like fashion, go

As many black and asian people "Use" racism for their own goals, eventually the "cry wolf" scenario will be understood and maybe those who scream they have been racially abused will be found out that they were targeted by something that they did or said rather than the colour of their skin. They will always call the race card though. Its a shame it appears to be a one way street though, try complaining that youve been racially abused by a black or asian and nothing seems to happen. Other way round you get arrested and thrown in a cell whether its proved or not.

Its also a well known fact that many of these racism cries like the one to ban Christmas and to call it winterval in Birmingham was laughed at by blacks and asians who had no problems with it at all but it was liberal busy bodies imposing what they thought would constitute bad feeling and upset Jews/muslims etc. Similarly with the St George Flag, these same liberal do gooders accuse it of being a racist flag and try to remove it wherever it is never mind its the Flag of England and banning it only fuells the hatred towards other races even though its not the blacks/asians who are bothered by these things, its the doo gooder busy bodies who look for racism everywhere and impose their beliefs on everyone causing it rather than subduing it.

England is still a mainly white Christian Country.... why dont these idiots remember this and stop pandering to the Libral perceived wishes of the immigrants and those from different races who were born here. They try to make us feel that "English and England" are dirty words.

1173. What Really Happened in 1936

Morse Code test speeds for an amateur license were increased from 10 wpm to 13 wpm, circa 1936, at the request of the ARRL president in a letter to the FCC.
See Page 82 of "Fifty Years of ARRL" -- that's no deep dark secret.

But it's not the whole story.

The request was for an increase from 10 wpm to 12-1/2 wpm. The FCC "rounded up" to 13 wpm on their own.

The same letter requested more comprehensive WRITTEN exams,
updated to the current technology then used by hams.
This was also granted by the FCC. There were only three classes of license at the time, and all required
the same code speed.

The code speed increase is often remembered. The written test improvement is rarely if ever remembered.

This whole situation is frequently "spin doctored"
by those who say the code test speed was raised to limit the number of amateurs.

For example, it was claimed by WA6VSE (now WK3C) back in 1999 that:

"The ARRL wanted faster code tests PURELY as a means of slowing growth in the amateur ranks, contending that (with about 30,000 hams at the time) "the bands are approaching saturation" ... clearly a ridiculous claim."

The saturation thing was a very realistic claim. And there were 46,000 US hams, not 30,000.

Here's "the rest of the story":

The ham bands of the time consisted of 160, 80, 40, 20, 10, 5, 2-1/2 and 1-1/4 meters. Nothing else.

The bands below (shorter in wavelength) than 20 meters were sparsely populated by hams, due to the difficulty of getting simple 1930s equipment to work at all on such frequencies, and the limited results that could be expected.

160 was popular with 'phone men, but a decent antenna for that band was/is enormous and BCI could be a real devil.

10 was not as popular because of its varying propagation and equipment difficulties.

So most hams were on 80, 40, and 20, using simple, Depression era stations. A "pair of tens and a three tube blooper" (push pull self-controlled oscillator transmitter and regenerative receiver) was typical, and many hams did not even have that. Home-made stations were common - a station that had no home-brew was very rare.

Yes, crystal controlled, multistage transmitters and single signal superhet receivers were in use, but only by a few wealthy hams.
There were even some amateurs using SSB voice, but the cost and complexity of such a station kept their numbers to a handful. Those hams who did use voice were almost all using double-sidebandwith-carrier AM, and took up 6 to 10 kc of the band each.

In practice, ham QSOs of the day rarely had both stations on the same frequency. Many of the simple transmitters of the 1930s were not designed for rapid QSY, and straying outside the band was too easy.
Crystal controlled operation was even less flexible.

So most QSOs used up two frequencies - what would be called "split" operation today. This meant that the QRM was twice as bad as if everyone had "zero beat" QSOs.

In order to make contacts under such conditions, it was necessary to tune through the band pretty quickly, to hear any replies to a CQ.
This meant receivers with fast tuning rates and not too much selectivity.

The result was that each QSO required much more room than today.

The total available spectrum on 80, 40, and 20 added up to only 1200 kilocycles. (We're talking about the '30s, so I use the historic term).
Put 4600 hams (10% of the total licensees) on the air at once and each would less than 250 cycles. The bands WERE approaching saturation.

Saturation was not the only problem. There were about 19,000 USA licensed hams in 1929. Their number had grown slowly but steadily from the post WW1 reactivation ten years earlier.

In 1929 there came new regs that dramatically cut the width of the bands (40 was once 7-8 Mc., 20 was 14-16 Mc.) and required much cleaner signals from ham stations. Yet over the next few years, in the depths of the Great Depression, the number of US ham licenses almost tripled, to 46,000. In addition, many newcomers left the hobby quickly

- at one point in the early '30s, turnover approached 40% per year.
That
meant most hams were newcomers, often technically and operationally lacking in skills and knowledge. One less-than-knowledgeable ham with a faulty transmitter could make a real mess on the band. Worse, a ham who strayed out of the band could mess up nonamateur radio services in a big way.

The very existence of amateur radio in the 1930s wasn't very secure. Even after hams were allowed back on the air after WW1, there were several efforts to kill off or severely restrict amateur radio all through the 1920s. Amateur radio did not achieve international treaty status until 1927, and the price for that status was the extreme loss of bandspace on 40 and 20 meters listed above. The 1927 treaty also required clean signals, Morse Code testing and written testing of all radio amateurs.

Those in the 1930s who knew the history understood that if amateurs strayed out of their bands too much, the same forces that had tried to kill off amateur radio in the '20s might well succeed in the 1930s.

The idea was to slow the rapid turnover and insure that new hams were more operationally skilled and technically knowledgeable, by requiring a little more code speed and a lot more technical knowledge.

Today we have far more bandwidth, far more sophisticated equipment, and far more options in choice of band and mode.

Before criticizing the actions of almost 70 years ago, one should first get a clear picture of the conditions of the time. Critics of the ARRL action are invited to build an operating amateur station, using only parts and techniques available in the early '30s - and do it on a Depression-era budget, as well. Then try to use said station on the ham bands, and see what conclusions are drawn.

The point of all this is that ham radio was VERY different in the '30s, and solutions that seem simple and obvious today were not practical for most hams back then. What is really amazing is that so many hams succeeded, using such simple equipment.

A big part of the story was the use of CW, and the operating skills of the hams of the day. But in some circles it is electropolitically incorrect to talk about operating skills in a positive manner. Or to suggest that perhaps the Ancient Ones knew something about what they were doing.

Did you find anything untruthful in my statements above? There was certainly no Britain assisting us in Vietnam. Nobody defeated the United States militarily in Vietnam.

The British government is quite rightly involved in that which is in its own self-interest. Wasn't Britain involved in marking up maps to create the present day Iraq? It would have been nice if someone in charge had known what tribal groups lived where, don't you think?

You actually did receive help in several forms during the "fighting" in the Falklands.

If Great Britain could not wrest control of those islands from Argentina, it should have held a going out of business sale.

The bandplans would be under OUR (the users) control, not some dis-interested bureacrat. Changes could happen dynamically as we needed them, not sit on a backburner until some bureacrat retired and the new guy sorted through his "pending" tray.

> OTOH, that approach rewards those who use the most spectrum,

Measured how? If you measure only in terms of raw bandwidth consumption, then CW or PSK probably wins. If you measure in terms of payload throughput-per-Hz then then something like Q15x25 is dramatically more efficient.

Which begs the point anyhow, because in a service which is chartered with a mission of experimentation and "contribute to the advancement of the radio art", bandwidth efficiency is only a single measure of value.

The White House was torched after America declared war on Britain which was already involved in a war against another dictator. Did you win the war? No. America was suicide bombed. Have you won the "War against terror"? NO!

> The United States defeated Britain for the second time in the War of

Of course I can see now where you're coming from. America in yet another war of aggression attacks Great Britain when it thinks its attention is elsewhere and its forces weakened. Even though playing from home Crown Forces successfully repulse the invasion of Canada and go on to burn the nations capital. Having learned from this lesson America decides it is safer to have the UK as an ally rather and an enemy and in future limits its aggression to wars that are already mostly won or the invasion of little 3rd world countries.

I'm sure that you can come up with a scenario in which Britain > could have won the war if only it had taken it seriously.

Yes I can see how an American would equate the buring of his capital and seat of power along with several repulsed invasions of Canada as a victory.
Only a typical yank could equate the ending of the war as a victory.

When the war ended the best army in the field was unquestionably the British and it was largely the British who made the sweeping gains of the last days. The Americans did bugger all even when the war was in danger of being lost early in 1918.

But who will have the authority to set OUR bandplan?? Which group of users will be chartered with that task? What if I don't belong to that group? Or what if I find it objectionable?

That's what will be the real problem. As so many have pointed out, there is no organization to which the majority of hams belongs, at least in this country. While the ARRL is the largest, the majority of the ham population does NOT belong to it and will likely scream bloody murder if they were to get to establish the band plan.

You mention the IARU but that won't work right now either. We have some additional frequencies that they do not. Tasking them with planning is not appropriate for frequencies used only by a single country or very small group of countries. Then of course there is the sovereignty issue. Some countries, including the US, probably will not want to give them that much power.

Finally, having the IARU (or any other body) designate a mandatory band plan goes against the principle of "free market" for dynamic allocation of the frequencies. A group would have to meet and reallocate as needed. Also the flexibility that groups such as contestors currently have would be diminished. Let's just deal with the US allocations on say 40m here. Right now, the contestors can and do use 7.150 to 7.300 for major contests, ignoring the "band plan" allotment for SSTV. For the short time span of the major contest, that extra space is significant. But with a mandatory band plan, they couldn't do that. Unless the committee met before the contest and OK'd it or had so many exceptions to the plan that it would become a nightmare. The situation gets worse for the cw/digital section.

If you think a planning group could keep up, just look at the band plans currently published on the ARRL web site. They are out of step with the current actual digital operating frequencies in some cases.

MY BAD!!!

Should read "'phone hams"!

Sidebar point: In those days, amateur HF 'phone operation was limited to 160, 75, 20 and 10 meters. Not only were the subbands allocated to 'phone
narrower than today, but use of 75 and 20 meter 'phone required a Class A license. 160 and 10 meters became very popular 'phone bands because all license classes could operate 'phone there.

True enough.

However the point is still valid - the number of QSOs that the 1930s
HF amateur bands and equipment could handle was much less than today.

Granted the fact in their schools, they may just brush over it in normal curriculums, that still doesn't eliminate him from learning it on his own or in college.

I'm reminded of having been called a "liar" because I said that Michael Deignan had 12 amateur radio licenses. I was wrong. Michael Deignan's wife had one of them, at same address (at that time). Mike only had 11. I believe Riley then whittled it down to 3. But I'm a "liar."

Tapdance? Jim, please feel free to provide a direct quote. Really.

Or even better, you could explain how one "serves in other ways."

Real estate chatter snipped.

Now, now, "legality" was not part of the boundary conditions!

"Legality" does NOT enter the picture if you are talking about LEGAL LICENSES. If one has a legal license then they ARE legal. Try to stay focussed.

Tsk, your little political heart have a malfunction?
[need a "valve" replacement?]

The "back-up" is the NON-ARRL history of amateur radio regulations, indeed ALL the radio regulations since 1912. POLITICS, little Jimmie. It's been pervasive in the very being of the league since 1914. A "one-party" system more or less in between the World Wars and on to the immediate post-WW2 era. By the 1970s other groups were being heard from and the league's virtual oligarchy was beginning to dwindle. Just the beginning of their influence, but it IS dwindling to the REAL law-makers.

>> In the beginning there was only ONE license.
>
>The time of one-amateur-radio-license-class ended

U.S. amateur radio licensing began in 1912 92 years ago. [historical fact]

The FCC has been in existance for 71 years. [law of the land as of the Communications Act of 1934]

>Yes. Amateur radio licenses are earned by passing the >required tests.

Strange, the FCC says it GRANTS them.

How much did you earn on your test? Was it fixed-fee or at an hourly rate? Did you get cash or was it by check? Did you have to file any W-2s on that earning?

>Sure. But you haven't earned any amateur radio license, Len....

I haven't gotten any money for it, true. :-)

Neither do I (or did) live in Louisiana like Broose. :-)

Whoa...if you agree to what I said, how can you say you "earned" your license?

Amateur radio provided shelter, food, clothing for hurricane victims? Geez, here I thought all they were doing was relaying health and welfare messages...some of the time.

How many hurricane victims are you providing food and shelter for, Jimmie?

league for years...

Entirely true. FCC is NOT an academic organization, "grading"
amateurs on their radio skills.

Tsk, tsk, what is that but REGULATION? :-)

Tsk, "achievement" can be shown many, many ways. You could have little merit badges, for example. Those would look good on your amateur radio service uniforms.

Both Office Depot and Office Max stores offer packets of gold stars, have both paperware and software products for certificates (suitable for framing).

>The complexity of the task of operating a radio

Tsk, I thought it was an example. An example that I lived

Ah, THAT's the difference! You didn't do it, were unacquainted with it, ergo it "did not apply!" :-)

How many 15 KW HF transmitters have you personally QSYed, Jimmie?

How many 10 KW HF transmitters? 5 KW? 1 KW?

>Besides, you've already contradicted yourself. The "very ordinary young men" >all had some form of technical training, and had been selected for the task.

"Selected for the task:" Personnel requirements were for N number of warm bodies within X number of MOS ranges. :-)

Tsk. Jimmie, you just don't understand how the military works.

If you were a "warm body" in the area and came even close to the requirements of filling a TO&E (Table of Organization and Equipment)
then you "got selected."

>The transmitters they adjusted were already set up, operating, and the

Did you expect that everyone had to build everything themselves?!?

Do you expect sailors to all get sheet steel and torches and build the ship they are going to serve on?

Do you expect airmen to all get aluminum and engines and build the aircraft they are going to serve on?

Do you expect choo-choo drivers to build their locomotives themselves? :-)

Yes, ONE TO THREE DAYS, the latter for the slow-learners and goofoffs. :-)

That's usually the situation with EVERY military or civilian organization. :-)

After some experience, the formerly-inexperienced BECAME the "experienced supervision" people.

>Len, you don't seem to be able to understand the concept of "amateur

Jimmie, YOU don't understand that every other radio service radio "rules." :-)

Not even MARS! :-)

Oh, you want PLMRS mobiles to send QSLs on "contacts?"

Do you want "radiosport contests" among aviation radio or maritime radio services?

Do you think policemen carrying neat little two-way radios subscribe to QST? :-)

No bother at all to me, Jimmie. I just disregarded any NEED to learn morse code since I was never, ever required to use it in the military or in the much longer civilian life career I still have.

>It seems to really bother you that I'm better than you

Har! No. Whatever skills you have at morsemanship are overwhelmed by your posturing arrogance of superiority at that singular skill. :-)

That's the current law, Jimmie. It's just a political thing.
Since no higher deity commanded that morse code testing be done for amateur radio licenses, ordinary humans must have done it. Whatever humans have done, humans can UNDO.

Tsk, tsk, ADJUSTMENT can be done by anyone in a non-radiating test. Takes NO "license" to perform a test-alignment-calibration such as done by factory folks on ham equipment.

Oh, dear, here it comes with posturing arrogance again...

The SGC 2020 full manual is available on the SGC website.
I don't see any "Southgate" company in any search result.
Maybe you can provide a link to a "Southgate" radio so that all can compare the two?

You have actually DONE all of that in a cockpit while aloft?

How about in a cockpit on the ground? Or in a lab/workshop on the ground?

Tell all what "OBS" means...or "LOC" or "GS" means. Tell us all how to acknowledge tower communications by voice, receive and read back flight plans, communicate with radar-guided air traffic control.

Tell us what "squawk" means in pilot parlance.

I've done all that...even after I gave up student flying.

What?!? NO need for morsemanship to be a pilot?!? :-)

FAA?

No, couldn't afford to continue. I did pass the written to see it? :-)

No "moonies" in that. However, I once considered buying a Mooney single-engine, was wisely talked out of it to invest in a residence (the present southern house).

Amateur radios don't go crashing through fences and killing kids in vehicles.

kill anyone going through the fence a Bob Hope Airport, but they did at Chicago's Midway]

Tsk, tsk, tsk...something I HAVE done, sweetums. Years ago a bunch of us got together to give a friend his retirement and birthday gift, an HF transceiver. I had the "plastic" higher level and paid for it, another with a station wagon transported the boxes, yet another provided the Bird Wattmeter and dummy load and we all went through the instruction manual to make sure it worked. NON-radiating test, Jimmie. Perfectly legal.

Yes, yes, Jimmie, whatever YOU use applies to all other 700+ thousand U.S. amateur radio licensees. :-)

None of the others USE anything but what you've USED?

>Six months of microwave school, a transmitter that was all set up >and ready to go, an experienced instructor, and it still took you >an hour of instruction?

Yes. :-)

Not having the SUPERIOR morsemanship skills nor the extensive amateur radio exprience (that automatically makes it possible to operate all transmitters everywhere of any make), we were all relegated to mere mortal human learning processes. :-)

By the way, part of that Signal Schooling was radar fundamentals.
That was because of the close similarity of radar electronics to the electronics used in radio relay equipments coming after WW2. Absolutely NONE of it prepared us for operating ANY of the HF transmitters (36 of them at first) at station ADA in 1953.
NONE of it prepared anyone for teletypewriter operation, for operation of the VHF and UHF radio relay equipment, for operation of the "carrier" bays. NONE of it involved learning of the General Electric commercial microwave radio relay equipment that ADA would use for primary communication link of transmitters to the rest of the station...we got a two-week "course" by two GE tech-reps to "prepare" us for that in late 1954.

>Some might say your behavior was closer to "monkey-see, monkey-do"...

Careful, Jimmie, you are going ape-shit in your nastiness.

Been eating bananas again?

Oh, I get it, you did the OOK, OOK thing!

Did you finally find the "gorilla of your dreams?" :-)

...and you've done that, right? :-)

developmental work in new solid-state amateur radio designs

(other than building an Elecraft kit).

>> And just what is

I've only listened to the predecessor of the Condor Net in Newbury Park, CA, demonstrated by one of the ham-licensed employees there. At Teledyne Electronics, my employer during the late 70s. It was the first state-long network to use all tone switching for routing without using any microprocessor control.

Tsk, you didn't exist until some time AFTER WW2, Jimmie.

That's only an OPINION, Jimmie. Tsk, better learn some acting

Tsk, tsk, tsk. That doesn't agree with www.hamdata.com figures.

from elsewhere as "official." Heavens, I have to keep taking THAT into account, don't I? :-)

>But that percentage is down from what it was 5 years ago, right after

Well now, www.hamdata.com figures also show the totals of EXPIRATIONS versus NEW (never before licensed) licensees.
Expirations still exceed the NEW licensees and have for the last year.

>And for more than 5-1/2 years, the only choice new hams have had for help you lose your posturing arrogance of superiority...

I asked around. :-)

If, on a sampling basis, ten out of ten answer "it was the lack of a code test," then I'd assume it was because of that.

Of course, as a dyed-in-the-woolies morseman, you are not expected to accept that. TS.

A word of advice: Avoid street fighting...you ain't good at it.

Oh, my, that old thing again. Jimmie, TRY to learn to write "licensed" before "amateur radio," then you will be correct in your beloved nastygram.

I was an amateur radio hobbyist beginning in 1947, including modifying some WW2 surplus ARC-5 receivers and transmitters for AC power operation as well as BC radios. I didn't bother with getting a LICENSE then, Jimmie. I didn't bother with getting ANY federal radio operator license until 1956 and that one was a Commercial one. First class, one sitting.

You don't like that? TS.

Those "hooks" were called "spikes" or "boot spikes." The

Not quite. :-) In soldier training which we did on a much alone. Usually as recon observers. Sometimes we would be the walkie-talkie carriers on patrol exercises.

(AN/PRC-9s for us at the time, -8 or -10 for others)

In the presence of lethal AC primary power it was customary to have at least two on duty at a particular place for safety reasons.

Yes, yes, you were the teen-age hero of radio. Did you engage in "seven hostile actions" too? :-)

>> What "incentives" did we have? Name them.

"Better duty?" Same basic job at same place, more responsibility, more attention to running tasks rather than doing them. We had "permanent passes" off-post at all ranks.

"Interesting work?" I thought it was "interesting" from day one. :-)

"More pay?" Yes, in a way. As a Sergeant E-5, with overseas bonus, my monthly pay got as high as $156!!! :-)

[big Ben Stein "wowwwww" there... :-)]

>Also the negative incentives - somebody who didn't >do the job right could wind up in the infantry...

I don't know of any case where that happened. I'm sure you do because you "know exactly how it was." :-)

Do the job poorly and your duty switched without being reassigned. Do the job really badly and you could wind up in a court-martial.

Er, we didn't practice "decimation" a la the old Roman Legions. :-)

>Guess what? Civilians have a similar situation - except >civilians can usually quit at any time.

Guess what, sweetums, I've been a civilian since 1956.

Try as I might, I can't see any civilian occupation where anyone "closes with, and destroys, the enemy." Not even the police departments get that drastic. Destructive environmental testing and building demolition isn't about
"destroying the enemy."

>> Describe YOUR "EME" station, Jimmie.

Wow! Really something! I've got a couple documents on building a JPL Deep Space Network earth station. Explains a lot of it in those. Mars and the Jovians are a bit farther out than the Earth's moon.

A "Goldstone" antenna isn't allowed in my residential zoned neighborhood and I don't have a few million bucks to spend on one. Maybe I'm supposed to wait for a big Lotto winning?

>My whole point is that amateur radio is a completely different >environment, and your military radio experiences don't

Jimmie, "your whole point" is spent in a fruitless exercise to get me to cease and desist posting in here...because my opinions are contrary to yours on your radio hobby.

HF radio is HF radio. It doesn't matter what label you attach to it...military, civilian, commercial, amateur...the physics of it are the SAME regardless. Regulatory statements about USE are (and have almost always been) POLITICAL insofar as allocations of use and "classes" of operator licenses...in any civilian radio service in the USA.

>Now you consider yourself superior to almost everyone!

No. I don't consider myself "superior" to anyone. If you get that perception, TS, I'm outspoken and don't use gratuitous phrases of praises in newsgroups.

>Certainly to anyone who disagrees with you.

Poor baby...afraid of losing your assumed ranking as one of the pontifical arrogant old-line parrots of league phrasing?

The taxpayers would be out the SAME amount of money if I hadn't gone to this "intense" school of 8 hours a day,
5 days a week...:-)

BWAAAAHAHAHAHAHAHA!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!

"Intense?" Hardly. I've worked far longer hours for the SAME pay as a civilian.

No, we didn't sleep intense. We had wooden barracks buildings left over from WW2, then quonset hut barracks also left over from WW2. :-) Fort Monmouth's "permanent" billets were still in construction in 1952.

I picked "wrong employers?!?" HAAARRRR!

Hughes Aircraft Company, Thompson Ramo-Wooldridge, Teledyne Electronics, RCA Corporation, Rockwell International. My major employers. Little bitty shack-type employers, yah? :-)

>And the compensation you did get was continued employment.
>That's the way it works!

No shit? Wow! Revelations! BWAAAAHAHAHAHA!!!!!!!!!!

Jimmie, a salary is what one gets as "compensation for work performed." A paycheck is, in reality, a legal document attesting to that.

Do you get "compensation" for your amateur radio "service?"

>Try working 35-38 hours a week, taking 5 engineering

Oh! Travail and suffering you must have gone through!

You got me beat. I worked 40 to 48 hours a week but never took more than 3 courses at night per semester. [there's such a thing as trying to keep a social life at least puttering along on standby for one day off a week instead of ossifying to some kind of reclusive social dummy...:-)]

Well, I did have a CAR! Wow, how fortunate of me, a veritable "luxury" in the Los Angeles area where things tend to be separated by MANY miles. :-) Wanna see a picture of my 1953 rebuilt Austin-Healey two-door sports car? Had that for much of my 15 calendar years of college-level schooling. I have it digitized, can send it e-mail. :-)

That's what makes the IARU an attractive vehicle. While no individual pays memberships dues in IARU, all hams are defacto members of IARU because each country has a representative who represents ALL hams in their jurisdiction independent of whether they are members of the national "club" like ARRL, RAC, RSGB, DARC, JARL, or whatever.

Huh?

IARU is not a government agency. It is >>us<<, the hams of the world, totally independent of national governments and independent of international organizations like ITU or CEPT. Who better than the >>hams<< to decide how >>ham<< frequencies should be used? Are we so conditioned to "big government" dependency that (within our allocations) we need disinvolved government bureaucrats to make decisions that much more logically belong to the actual affected users?

I agree with you that some frequencies are better planned at a more local level when those plans have no global implications. IARU is already regionally localized into Region I, II, and III, and that localization makes perfect sense for shared MF/HF bands. Further localization for "national only" bands, and for V/UHF allocations is a natural extension of the idea. An example of that model is the state/regional-localized V/UHF NFCC bandplanning which already operates independently of the FCC and ARRL in the US.

> Finally, having the IARU (or any other body) designate a mandatory band plan

To the extent that the band plan would not be dynamic on a minute-to-minute schedule, you are correct. But it certainly be more dynamic and responsive that the current generation-to-generation schedule of ?97.305.

> A group would have to meet and reallocate as needed.

In the 1930's that certainly would have been an impediment. But 75 years later in 2005, give me a list of 100 IARU representatives and within the next hour I can establish a secure and private "meeting room" on the internet where they can hold their allocation meetings, hammer out their agreements, and publish the bandplan on a global basis before halftime of Monday Night Football.

Jim just got through posting that in 1936 the code speed was *increased and the written exams made *more comprehensive for the three license classes at the time. Later, >all priveleges< were granted to the General class license. Then they were taken away.

Now, one license class with the equivalent of the General Class exam is "lowering the requirements."

Jim sees what Jim wants to see.

One doesn't have to upgrade at all. At one time the General conveyed all amateur priveleges, and few amateurs tested higher. Then the FCC implemented the Incentive Licensing System which you loved, took away priveleges, and the rest is history. Now you say that going back to all priveleges for the General exam is lowering requirements.

Sorry you feel that way.

No, it wouldn't. Strawman.

The General License used to convey ALL AMATEUR PRIVELEGES.

You're the one who loved the Incentive Licensing System which took priveleges away from fully qualified amateurs. You're the one who loves unnecessary licensing requirements.

I hear nothing from him on "serving."

Could be he fired up his personal "wayback machine" and went back to 1936 to review the ARRL political situation on morris goad testing rates. I think that was before "Farnsworth" rates were introduced.

In 1936 I was 3 to 4 years old. Jimmie didn't exist anywhere close to zygote stage yet, wouldn't be born for 19 or so years.

Heh heh, that "love" is "tough." :-)

Yeah, I remember Mikey D's little missives in here, his adventures with the (?) "radio commandos." Mikey ain't got them dozen club calls no more. How about that?

Brian, here's a KEEPER for an EXACT QUOTE. On December 10, 2005, Jimmie write the following:

"The FCC doesn't license radio amateurs."

Exact, word for word. :-)

Well, I think I obliged Jimmie with the destined-to-become-classic faux pas of his. Here it is again (from 10 Dec 05):

"The FCC doesn't license radio amateurs."

>> > He can't understand that other people read

Can we have some accompanyment to the time-steps? :-)

Guess I'll have to drive over to one of the "dancer's" cobbler shops in town and get some tap shoes. One guy claims to have done it on court shoes (a lot more comfortable than the leather-top jobbies). Good trick
if they last...

Here's a DIRECT QUOTE again (from Jimmie on 10 Dec 05):

"The FCC doesn't license radio amateurs."

>Or even better, you could explain how one "serves in other ways."

Always from the right of the patron? The lady first?

Gosh, we may have to get Jimmie an "Etty-Kit" so he can serve properly and correctly!

>Real estate chatter snipped.

Pity that. Jimmie KNOWS ALL ABOUT the "basis and purpose" of local zoning ordinances. We can say nothing about zoning until Jimmie gets us all "zoned" out of this world and into another realm of existance. Twilight Zone?

Jimmie need help of opthalmologist...he have astigmatism.

Ummm...yes, that's what I answered. Too obvious to be "seen,"
I guess...

Not applicable to Jimmie-discussions. He get Extra license, be "superior." He typify "superior" class, elite. Nobility?

Blue blood is thicker than water.

Brian, that wasn't the point. Jimmie try more misdirection by trying to start yet-another controversy over "what I want."
That can be expanded with his imaginary helium to "reach the threshold of [newsgroup] space."

He tried the same bullshit with my remark on "extra out of the box" five years ago in here...that I "WANTED" one...and the same thing on my Reply to Comments of Mikey D. on WT DOCKET 98-143 six years ago with "my WANTING an age limit on licensing."

Tsk, Jimmie complains that I "don't read what he wrote" and then takes my postings so far out of context that we might as well all be in outer space and/or the Twilight Zone.

Okay, in that spirit of misdirection in here, let me pass on an EXACT QUOTE of Jimmie's made on 10 December 2005:

"The FCC doesn't license radio amateurs."

Offhand, I'd say that Jimmie "wants" amateurs to be UN-LICENSED! :-)

Let's see if he can "tapdance" a few time-steps on that one?

Major typo alert!

Should read:

The FAA doesn't license radio amateurs.

But do the actual users get a real voice? Do I get to vote on the bandplan for bands I use? Do I even get to elect the representative who does?

Or will the bandplans be decided upon by folks whom are even less beholden to
"the users" than the FCC?

And here's the problem:

Suppose for a moment the IARU scheme is done by regionfor HF - after all,
